Bibliographical Abbreviations

All bibliographical abbreviations used in this dictionary are listed below, following the typography used in the text of the dictionary. Broadly, italic type is used for periodicals and for reference works; roman type is used for anthologies, series etc. (titles of individual volumes are italicized).

Full bibliographical information is not normally supplied in the list below if it is available elsewhere in the dictionary. Its availability is indicated as follows: D – in the list of 'Dictionaries and encyclopedias of music'; E – in the list of 'Editions, historical'; and P – in the list of 'Periodicals'; these lists are located in vol.28. For other items, in particular national (non-musical) biographical dictionaries, basic bibliographical information is given here; and in some cases extra information is supplied to clarify the abbreviation used.

Festschriften and congress reports are not generally covered in this list. Although Festschrift titles are sometimes shortened in the dictionary, sufficient information is always given for unambiguous identification (dedicatee; occasion, if the same person is dedicatee of more than one Festschrift; place and date of publication; and name(s) of editor(s) if known). For fuller information on musical Festschriften up to 1967 see W. Gerboth: An Index to Musical Festschriften and Similar Publications (New York, 1969). The published titles of congress reports are generally reduced to their essentials, but sufficient information is always given for purposes of identification (society or topic; place and date of occurrence; journal issue if published in a periodical; editor(s) and publication details in unfamiliar cases). A comprehensive list of musical and music-related 'Congress reports' appears in vol.28. Further information can be found in J. Tyrrell and R. Wise: A Guide to International Congress Reports in Music, 1900–1975 (London, 1979).

Library Sigla

The system of library sigla in this dictionary follows that used by Répertoire International des Sources Musicales, Kassel, as listed in its publication RISM-Bibliothekssigel (Kassel, 1999). Below are listed the sigla to be found; a few of them are additional to those published in the RISM list, but have been established in consultation with the RISM organization. Some original RISM sigla that have now been changed are retained here.

More information on individual libraries is available in the libraries list in volume 28.

In the dictionary, sigla are always printed in italic. In any listing of sources a national sigillum applies without repetition until it is contradicted.

Within each national list, entries are alphabetized by sigillum, first by capital letters (showing the city or town) and then by lower-case ones (showing the institution or collection).

A Note on the Use of the Dictionary

This note is intended as a short guide to the basic procedures and organization of the dictionary. A fuller account will be found in the Introduction, vol. l, pp.xix–xxix.

Abbreviations in general use in the dictionary are listed on pp.vii–xi; bibliographical ones (periodicals, reference works, editions etc.) are listed on pp.xiii–xviii and discographical abbrevations on pp.xix–xx.

Alphabetization of headings is based on the principle that words are read continuously, ignoring spaces, hyphens, accents, bracketed matter etc., up to the first comma; the same principle applies thereafter. 'Mc' and 'M'' are listed as 'Mac', 'St' as 'Saint'.

Bibliographies are arranged chronologically (within section, where divided), in order of year of first publication, and alphabetically by author within years.

Cross-references are shown in small capitals, with a large capital at the beginning of the first word of the entry referred to. Thus 'The instrument is related to the BASS TUBA' would mean that the entry referred to is not 'Bass tuba' but 'Tuba, bass'.

Signatures where the article was compiled by the editors or in the few cases where an author has wished to remain anonymous are indicated by a square box (□).

Work-lists are normally arranged chronologically (within section, where divided). Italic symbols used in them (like D-Dl or GB-Lbl) refer to the libraries holding sources, and are explained on pp.xxi–xxxvii; each national sigillum stands until contradicted.

Jennens, Charles (b Gopsall, Leics., 1700; d Gopsall, bur. Nether Whitacre, Warwicks., 20 Nov 1773). English patron, author and librettist. The grandson of a wealthy Birmingham ironmaster, he was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, and subsequently divided his time between London and his father's Leicestershire estate. His devotion to Handel's music is first attested in his subscription to Rodelinda (1725), the first Handel score published by subscription; thereafter he was a constant and generous subscriber. A member of the circle of Handel's admirers that included the 4th Earl of Shaftesbury and James Harris, Jennens had catholic but decisive musical tastes. He had a harpsichord sent from Florence, and was critical of it, had an organ made to Handel's specification (now at Great Packington church, Warwickshire) and owned a fortepiano by 1756. He had copies made for him of every note that Handel wrote, forming the magnificent Aylesford Collection (principally GB-Mp). He figured the bass lines in many of these copies, presumably in order to play them. He had part of Cardinal Ottoboni's library and other music manuscripts procured for him in Italy, forming definite views of them (and lending them to Handel, who used them); and he encouraged the work of English composers.

Jennens offered Handel a libretto in 1735 and continued writing for him over the next ten years. He was Handel's best librettist. He wrote the librettos of Saul and Belshazzar and compiled the text of Messiah, which was his idea; he prompted James Harris to draft the libretto of L'allegro ed il penseroso, which he and Handel completed (Jennens supplying Il moderato at Handel's request). He also probably compiled the text of Israel in Egypt. Although the relationship of librettist and composer (both strongly opinionated and touchy) could be tempestuous, they remained good friends, Jennens commissioning Thomas Hudson's 'Gopsall' portrait of Handel (1756) and Handel bequeathing Jennens two paintings. Handel accepted some of Jennens's suggested alterations during the composition of Saul. Encouragement of Handel was one aspect of Jennens's lifelong patronage of the arts and letters. In 1747 he inherited Gopsall (736 acres) and 34 other properties in six counties, and transformed Jacobean Gopsall Hall into the finest late Palladian mansion in England (demolished 1951). His picture and sculpture collection comprised over 500 items, and was described in T. Martyn's The English Connoisseur (London, 1766), a survey of the 20 best English art collections.

Two deep loyalties underpinned Jennens's life: to Protestant Christianity and to the deposed royal house of Stuart. He was a staunch Nonjuror (refusing to abjure allegiance to the Stuarts) and the leading patron of Nonjurors of his generation. Some of his beneficiaries were also Jacobites. Within the bounds of legality Jennens declared his adherence to the old regime, and his librettos of Saul and Belshazzar can be read as expressing his opposition commitment. His librettos, outstandingly Messiah, are also eloquent statements of his evangelizing commitment to Christian doctrine, which is likewise attested by his art collection and commissions, book subscriptions, legacies, and library of theological works. He was sensitive and depressive, possibly manic-depressive (his younger brother Robert committed suicide), and never married. He could appear haughty, which (with his great wealth) earned him resentment. Derogation of his abilities mainly derives from abusive allegations by his rival Shakespeare editor George Steevens, who justifiably envied Jennens's scrupulous and forward-looking single-volume editions of King Lear, Hamlet, Othello, Macbeth and Julius Caesar (London, 1770–74).

Informative letters to and from Jennens are in the Coke Collection and the Malmesbury Papers (GB-WCr).

RUTH SMITH

Jennings, Anthony (b Wellington, 6 Feb 1945; d Sydney, 30 July 1995). New Zealand harpsichordist, organist, choral and orchestral director. A brilliant student, he took the BMus at Victoria University, Wellington, in 1968. Following postgraduate study in Brussels (1972), he was awarded the Kingdom of Belgium Pro Arte Gold Medal. In 1973 he took a postgraduate diploma at the GSM, London. During these years he was choirmaster at the Pro-Cathedral of the Holy Trinity, Brussels, and assistant organist at St Alban's Cathedral, England. These laid the foundations for his appointment as director of music at the Cathedral of the Holy Trinity, Auckland (1974–85). Under his directorship the cathedral choir flourished and made several recordings. He held a senior lectureship at the University of Auckland from 1974 to 1991 and moved to the faculty of music at Newcastle University, Australia, in 1992. At the time of his death he had been appointed director of music at St James's Church, Sydney.

His musical skills were wide-ranging and supported by a charismatic personality. A virtuoso organist, his performances of Romantic and contemporary repertory are remembered for their technical brilliance and musical power, but his special contribution was in the area of Baroque performance. As a teacher and performer he championed the cause of authenticity, introducing fine examples of French-, Italian-, Flemish- and German-style harpsichords to New Zealand and designing a replica of a 17th-century Dutch organ for the Maclaurin Chapel at Auckland University. His harpsichord recordings, of Bach and other Baroque composers, demonstrate superb musicianship and his solid grounding in Baroque performing practice.

J.M. THOMSON

Jennings, Terry (b Eagle Rock, CA, 19 July 1940; d San Pablo, CA, 11 Dec 1981). American composer and performer. He had a background in jazz, playing the piano, the clarinet, and the alto and soprano saxophones. In 1953 he met La Monte Young in Los Angeles, where they played jazz together. Jennings first came to musical prominence in the late 1950s when he began to compose in the style of Young's influential early works involving sustained tones and expanded time concepts. He was introduced to the New York avant garde in 1960, when Young opened his series of concerts at Yoko Ono's loft with two programmes of Jennings's music. Jennings participated in many concerts of new music in the 1960s, both as composer and performer, giving the first performance of, among other works, Richard Maxfield's Wind for tape and saxophone, which was composed as a musical portrait of him. He worked with the James Waring Dance Company (1962) and performed and recorded with Young's Theatre of Eternal Music. Jennings's Piano Piece (June 1960) and String Quartet (1960) were published in An Anthology (edited by Young, 1963), which led to their performance in England by Cornelius Cardew and others. Two concerts of Jennings's music were presented at Steinway Hall, New York, in Ben Patterson's series of avant-garde music, 'January to June'. With Young and Terry Riley, Jennings was involved in the earliest developments of drone-inspired, modal, repetitive music. He is best known for two piano works of 1965, Winter Trees and Winter Sun, both of which exemplify the repetitive, non-virtuoso keyboard style he was among the first to employ; sets of phrases are played quietly in a specified order but repeated at will, in relatively free rhythm, and with liberal use of the sustaining pedal, creating a meditative mood and an understated lyricism. Jennings had a decisive influence on such composers as Harold Budd, Peter Garland and Howard Skempton, who in the early 1970s created a body of so-called 'minimalist' keyboard music and were among the few musicians to perform his works. In later years Jennings composed works in a neo-romantic style, including the song cycle The Seasons (1975).

PETER GARLAND, LA MONTE YOUNG

Jennings, Waylon [Wayland Arnold] (b Littlefield, TX, 15 June 1937). American country singer-songwriter. Both his parents played the guitar in Texas dance halls. At the age of 12 he took a job as a disc jockey on local radio, moving in 1955 to a station in Lubbock where Buddy Holly appeared on his show. Jennings then became the bass guitarist in Holly's band, the Crickets, but returned to Lubbock following Holly's death in 1959. Although his first single (Jole Blon, Bruns., 1958) had been produced by Holly, it was not until the mid-1960s that he began to record in earnest. By then settled in Nashville, he worked with producer Chet Atkins to develop a folk-country style. Along with Johnny Cash, Willie Nelson and Kris Kristofferson, Jennings played the role of a Nashville rebel both professionally and personally. This reputation was further enhanced when he recorded songs for the soundtrack of the film, Ned Kelly, which helped him cross over into rock and pop. His subsequent album, Singer of Sad Songs (1971) reflected a tougher, more defiant image, as did Honky Tonk Heroes (1973).

His 1975 album, Wanted: the Outlaws, broke into the pop charts and was the first of several collaborations with Willie Nelson that greatly raised the profiles of both singers. Jennings has also recorded with a number of other prominent country and crossover artists, and, for the concept album Highwaymen (Col., 1985), he worked with Nelson, Cash and Kristofferson, whose songwriting talents he had long championed. Individual, uncompromising and proud of his working-class, hillbilly roots, Jennings experimented to create a new and distinctive strand of country music: the terms 'new Nashville', 'progressive country' and 'outlaw music' have all been used of his work.

LIZ THOMSON

Jenny, Markus (b Stein, canton of St Gallen, 1 June 1924). Swiss hymnologist. He studied Protestant theology at the universities of Basle and Zürich with Karl Barth, Oscar Cullmann, Ina Lohr and Wolfram von den Steinen. He was successively rector of Saas, canton of Graubünden (1950–56), of Weinfelden, canton of Thurgau (1956–63) and of the Swiss Institute for Epileptics, Zürich (from 1963). In 1955 he took the doctorate with Ina Lohr at Basle with a dissertation on the Swiss Reformation hymnals of the 16th century. In 1964 he completed the Habilitation and became a lecturer in practical theology at the University of Zürich; he became professor there in 1973. He has prepared several editions of hymnbooks and was editor of Musik und Gottesdienst, 1975–83.

Jenny has confined himself almost entirely to questions of Protestant hymnology: his main works have been on the songs of the Zwinglian church and their links with and differences from those of the Lutheran church. In particular he has studied the function of church singing in Zwingli's church and Zwingli's own hymn writing.

JÜRG STENZL

Jensen, Adolf (b Königsberg [now Kaliningrad], 12 Jan 1837; d Baden-Baden, 23 Jan 1879). German composer. He came from a musical family and first studied music with the Königsberg Kapellmeister Eduard Sobolewski; between 1849 and 1852 he was a pupil of Louis Ehlert, Louis Köhler and Friedrich Marpurg. An early volume of songs op.1 was published by his father in 1849; it was later withdrawn, and his actual op.1 (6 songs) did not appear until 1859. Early in 1856 he went to Brest Litovsk as music teacher to the family of the Russian governor Rejch; there he composed, among other works, a piano trio which he dedicated to Liszt. In 1857–8 he worked as a Kapellmeister at theatres in Posen, Bromberg and in Copenhagen, where he remained as a piano teacher and came into close contact with Gade and J.P.E. Hartmann. He made a number of concert tours in Scandinavia with the cellist Christian Kellermann. Owing to a throat infection he was unable to accept an invitation to become Kapellmeister of the private orchestra of Prince Nicholas Yusupov in St Petersburg. In February 1861 he became second director of the music academy in Königsberg, which gave him the opportunity to conduct several important concerts; after his resignation in February 1862 he continued to make frequent appearances as a pianist. Jensen's marriage in October 1863 to Friederike Bornträger, a publisher's daughter, helped him towards financial independence.

In October 1866 Jensen went to Berlin at the invitation of Carl Tausig to teach at his piano school, but two years later he left to settle in Dresden in order to devote himself to composing. Having already become an enthusiastic admirer of Wagner, in Dresden he campaigned wholeheartedly in private lectures for the success of Die Meistersinger, on the occasion of the rehearsals of that work under Julius Rietz. In 1869 he sought a cure for his throat and lung affliction in visits to Ems, Reichenhall and Meran, but his condition gradually worsened over the following years and was not alleviated by his removals to Graz (1870–75) and Baden-Baden (1875–9). During these last years he led a very retiring existence and was only sporadically able to produce creative work. His friendly relations with well-known artists of his time are conspicuously revealed by the dedication of his compositions to Bülow (opp.4, 20 no.4, 36), Brahms (opp.7, 25), Gade (opp.10 no.1, 23), Franz (op.14), Paul Heyse (op.22), Berlioz (op.27), Emanuel Geibel (op.29) and Raff (op.31).

Jensen possessed one of the most delicate sensibilities of all late Romantic composers. The model for his early works was Schumann, and he succeeded in his mature piano music and songs in assimilating the stylistic influences of Chopin and Liszt into a thoroughly personal style. His professed aspiration in his later works was 'to translate Wagner's ideas of beauty and truth into music in the smaller forms'. His best piano compositions are distinguished by their melodic richness, rhythmic impetus, sonorous textures and by their colourful, at times almost impressionistic, harmonies. His songs, though uneven, include individual pieces belonging to the finest of their time; in these, Jensen showed himself a born lyricist, with a gift for translating poetic moods into music with assurance and imagination. A distinctly dramatic range of utterance is especially evident in the late English and Scottish songs and ballads; throughout these works his careful word-setting is notably impressive. He was less successful in handling larger forms, and his choral works and compositions with orchestra, despite some arresting features and distinguished scoring, were destined to failure. His only opera remained unperformed.

Jensen's grandfather, Wilhelm Gottlieb Martin (d 1842), was an organist, university music teacher and composer of chorales, songs and other vocal works; his father, Julius, was a piano teacher, piano tuner and music copyist. His uncle Eduard was a singer and singing teacher, also active in Königsberg, and Eduard's son, Paul (1850–1931), was a court opera singer and a teacher at the conservatory in Dresden. Jensen's brother Gustav (1843–1895) was a violinist, the composer of a Symphony op.35, a Sinfonietta op.22, songs, polyphonic vocal works, and chamber and piano works, and was also an editor of old music. From 1872 he was a teacher at the Cologne Conservatory.

ROBERT MÜNSTER

Jensen, Niels Martin (b Copenhagen, 17 March 1937). Danish musicologist. After studying the piano at the Royal Danish Conservatory and taking a degree in music and Danish at Copenhagen University (1956–64), he returned to the university to study 17th-century Italian instrumental music with Larsen (1966–8) and was appointed lecturer in the history and theory of music there in 1968. Concurrently he was music critic of the Berlingske tidende (1967–71). He has also been a consultant for Danish Radio, editor of Dansk årbog for musikforskning (1973–80) and Danish area editor for the revision of Sohlmans musikleksikon (Stockholm, 2/1975–9). He was president of the Danish Musicological Society (1992–8) and vice-president of IMS (1992–7). From 1994 to 1997 he was on leave of absence from the university in order to initiate a project to publish the complete works of Carl Nielsen. His research has been mainly concerned with Danish music, in which his special qualifications as a student of Danish literature have enabled him to make particularly valuable contributions to the study of the solo song in Denmark, and with Italian instrumental music in the 17th century.

JOHN BERGSAGEL

Jentzsch, Wilfried (b Dresden, 31 March 1941). German composer. Until the age of 16 he was a member of the Dresden Kreuzchor, whose conductor, Rudolf Mauersberger, did much to encourage him, giving the first performances of some of his pieces. Jentzsch attended the Dresden Elementary Music School (1957–60) and the Musikhochschule (1960–64), where he studied the cello, composition and conducting. He then studied with Cilenšek at the Musikhochschule in Weimar (1964–8) and with Wagner-Régeny and Dessau at the German Academy of Arts in Berlin (1968–71). He completed his studies after moving to West Germany in 1973, with Humpert at the Cologne Musikhochschule (1973–5) and with Xenakis at the Paris Sorbonne (1976–81). Jentzsch taught in Paris and Nuremberg and became professor of electronic music at the Dresden Musikhochschule in 1993. As a composer his interests lie in computer music, graphics and sound, and mathematical theories; he developed the computer program 'GraphicComposer'. In 1995 he was appointed chairman of the Gesellschaft für Neue Musik, Dresden.

LARS KLINGBERG

Jepp, Johannes. See JEEP, JOHANNES.

Jeppesen, Knud (Christian) (b Copenhagen, 15 Aug 1892; d Risskov, 14 June 1974). Danish musicologist and composer. Largely self-taught in music, he gained practical experience by working (under the name of Per Buch) as an opera conductor (1912–14) in Elbing and Liegnitz (now Legnica) until the outbreak of World War I obliged him to return to Denmark. He entered Copenhagen University to study musicology under Angul Hammerich (MA 1918) and became a pupil of Carl Nielsen and Thomas Laub, both of whom had a strong influence on his development as composer and scholar; he also took the organ diploma at the Royal Danish Conservatory of Music (1916) and became organist of St Stephen's (1917–32) and Holmens Kirke (1932–47), both in Copenhagen. Encouraged by Nielsen he attempted to establish himself as a composer but after a concert of his own works proved unsuccessful (1919), he turned entirely to research for 15 years. From 1920 he taught theory at the conservatory and under Laub's influence wrote a dissertation on Palestrina and dissonance, which he submitted to Copenhagen University in 1922. However, owing to Hammerich's retirement the university could not examine his work, which was submitted instead to Adler at the University of Vienna, where he was awarded the doctorate in 1922. Jeppesen was a council member of the newly reconstituted International Musicological Society (from 1927), president (1949–52), and editor-in-chief of its Acta musicologica (1931–54); he succeeded Nielsen on the board of directors of the Copenhagen Royal Conservatory (1932). He subsequently became the first professor of musicology at Århus University (1946), where he founded (1950) the Institute of Musicology and directed it until his retirement (1957). For some years thereafter he lived in Italy, where his research resulted in a number of important discoveries embodied in his valuable late editions.

Jeppesen was the leading authority of his time on Palestrina. His new understanding of Palestrina's style, incorporated in his major study (see ANALYSIS, §II, 4) and in a textbook on 16th-century vocal counterpoint (1930), decisively influenced subsequent appreciation of Italian Renaissance music. His many contributions to the subject included the discovery (in Milan, 1949) of ten previously unknown masses by Palestrina. His editions include the late 15th-century Burgundian Kopenhagener Chansonnier (1927, with the philologist Viggo Brøndal), a previously unknown Petrucci edition (1507) of polyphonic laudi (1935, also with Brøndal), and a three-volume collection of early 16th-century Italian church music, including works by Gasparo Alberti, a neglected Italian composer whom he had discovered (1962). His monumental La frottola (1968–70), a magnificently detailed bibliography and study, also includes an edition of hitherto unpublished music.

Jeppesen's writings about Danish music include a contribution to Adler's Handbuch der Musikgeschichte (1924) and important articles on Nielsen (from 1916 to 1931 he was Nielsen's closest musical associate). His most substantial scholarly work on Danish music though was his edition of the music of Mogens Pedersøn, a pupil of Giovanni Gabrieli and composer to Christian IV. Jeppesen returned to composition after succeeding Laub as organist at Holmens Kirke, and for the rest of his life regarded composition as an essential counterpart to his scholarly activities. His motets and other choral pieces (1935–6) were widely admired, as was a Reformation cantata (1936). His style was firmly traditional, but nevertheless inventive and personal. The influence on his work of 16th-century counterpoint is evident in his vocal writing, while his orchestral works show the influence of the late Viennese Romantics, Bruckner and Mahler (to whom he had been introduced by Adler), and Nielsen.

JOHN BERGSAGEL

Jeppsson, Kerstin (b Nyköping, 29 Oct 1948). Swedish composer. She graduated as a music teacher from the Royal College of Music in Stockholm in 1973. She studied composition first with Maurice Karkoff, then with Krzysztof Meyer and Penderecki (Kraków Conservatory, 1974 and 1977). She gained the BA (1977) in musicology, pedagogics and social anthropology from the University of Stockholm and the MFA (1979) from the California Institute of the Arts, where her teachers included Mel Powell (composition) and Daniel Schulman (conducting). She is a member of the Swedish Composers' Guild.

Her interest in poetry and the voice is reflected in the bias of her output towards vocal works. Swedish poetry in particular finds appropriate expression in her restrained but intense style, while the influence of Swedish folk and church music is evident in the structures, modality and economical rhythmic patterns of many of the settings. Pervading both the vocal and instrumental works are a sensitivity to timbre, feeling for balance, and supple melodic lines, well matched by harmonies that seldom jolt but often gently surprise the ear. The sum of these characteristics makes Jeppsson's music attractively distinct from the contemporary Swedish mainstream.

MARGARET MYERS

Jerea, Hilda (b Iaşi, 17 March 1919; d Bucharest, 14 May 1980). Romanian composer and pianist. She studied composition with Mihail Jora and the piano with Florica Musicescu at the Bucharest Conservatory (1929–35), continuing her studies with Noël Gallon in Paris and with Pál Kadosa and Leó Weiner in Budapest. In 1936 Jerea launched her career as a concert pianist. In Bucharest she worked as a teacher at the School of Arts (1942–4) and at the Academy (1948–9), then as secretary of the Union of Romanian Composers (1949–52) during an ideologically restrictive period. In the last two decades of her life Jerea founded and conducted the ensemble Musica Nova in Bucharest, which promoted the avant garde and supported young composers. While a folk influence informs her post-Romantic works of the 1940s, her compositions from the 1950s bear the simplistic imprint of socialist realism. In the 1960s she began to liberate herself from such stylistic limitations, adopting serial techniques in some works. Her music is characterized by its melodiousness, fluidity and spontaneity.

Jeremiáš. Czech family of musicians.

(1) Bohuslav Jeremiáš (b Řestoky, district of Chrudim, 1 May 1859; d České Budějovice, 18 Jan 1918). Composer, conductor and educationist. His first music teacher was his father, Josef Alois Jeremiáš (b Žumberk, district of Chrudim, 19 Feb 1808; d Chrast, district of Chrudim, 30 Oct 1883), a village schoolmaster. During the period 1882–5 Bohuslav was a pupil of F.Z. Skuherský at the Prague Organ School, and while a student in the capital he became acquainted with the works of Smetana and Dvořák, which he later performed at Písek (1887–1906) with amateur and school choirs and orchestras, along with compositions by other Czech composers (Křížkovský, Skuherský, Josef Foerster) and the Viennese Classicists (Haydn's Creation, symphonies by Mozart and Beethoven). He founded a music school at Písek; later he was active at České Budějovice (1906–19), where he founded a more important music school, the South Bohemian Conservatory. His extensive output, including the Kantáta Komenskému ('Cantata to Comenius'), patriotic choruses and songs, served the needs of a period of national revival, but his singing manuals have had a more lasting significance.

(2) Jaroslav Jeremiáš (b Písek, 14 Aug 1889; d České Budějovice, 16 Jan 1919). Composer and pianist, son of (1) Bohuslav Jeremiáš. He first learnt music at his father's music school in Písek and later in Prague, where he studied the piano under Mikeš at the conservatory (1906–09) and composition privately with Vítězslav Novák (1909–10). He made several strenuous European concert tours, sometimes as accompanist to the singers Karel and Emil Burian, which broke his health and hastened his early death. He was also a promising critic; as a partisan of Smetana and Wagner he wrote an interesting analysis of Tristan und Isolde (1913), but his failure to grasp the greatness of Janáček can be seen in his polemical pamphlet on Jenůfa and Smetana (1916). His compositions, though few, reveal a noteworthy talent which manifested itself most conspicuously in the oratorio Mistr Jan Hus (1914–15), first performed posthumously in 1920.

(3) Otakar Jeremiáš (b Písek, 17 Oct 1892; d Prague, 5 March 1962). Composer and conductor, son of (1) Bohuslav Jeremiáš. He received his earliest musical education from his father and his mother, the singer and pianist Vilma Jeremiášová, née Bakešová (1865–1953). He studied at the Prague Conservatory in 1907 and then privately, composition with Novák (1909–10) and the cello with Jan Burian, and was a cellist in the Czech PO (1911–13). He accompanied his brother Jaroslav on concert tours abroad, returning home in 1918 and settling in České Budějovice, where he became director of the music school after his father's death and conducted orchestral and choral concerts and opera. When Prague radio formed a symphony orchestra in 1929, he became its conductor; his artistic and administrative efforts brought the orchestra to a high standard, enabling it to perform a wide-ranging repertory.

In May 1945 Jeremiáš was appointed opera director of the National Theatre in Prague, where on 27 May 1945 he conducted Libuše, the first performance of Smetana's national opera after the Nazi occupation, when it had been prohibited. His withdrawal from this post in 1947 and a serious illness in 1949 prevented him from realizing all his artistic plans for the National Theatre, but he took an active part in cultural activities until the end of his life. In 1949 he was elected the first chairman of the Union of Czechoslovak Composers; having been a member of the Czech Academy of Sciences and Arts since 1928, he was awarded the title of National Artist in 1950 and the Order of the Republic in 1960.

Jeremiáš's active career as a conductor did not prevent him from being a prolific composer, chiefly of vocal works in the late Romantic style. In maintaining a balance between spontaneous and rational elements in his music he was an heir to Smetana, in whom he saw the embodiment of the genius of the Czech nation, a vision expressed in his booklet of essays on Smetana (1924). With his generation, he witnessed social struggles to which he sensitively responded as a performing artist and even more in his compositions. Like Janáček, he used texts by Czech poets of strong social conscience; both men set the poem Ostrava by Petr Bezruč. Jeremiáš's opera based on Dostoyevsky's The Brothers Karamazov (1922–7), full of dramatic tension, warmly emotional music and keen psychological portrayals, is his masterpiece and ranks among the best Czech operatic works. Other important compositions showing his lyrical gifts are the orchestral song cycle Láska ('Love', 1921) and the melodrama Romance o Karlu IV ('Romance of Charles IV', 1917). He was also the author of books on conducting (1943) and instrumentation (1943), which contain the fruits of his artistic and pedagogical experience.

Jerger, Alfred (b Brno, 9 June 1889; d Vienna, 18 Nov 1976). Austrian bass-baritone. After studying musicology and conducting at the Vienna Music Academy under Fuchs, Graedener and Gutheil he joined the staff of the Zürich Opera in 1913; he conducted operetta performances, worked as an actor, and in 1917 sang Lothario in Mignon. That year he so impressed Strauss with his performance as Baron Ochs that he was invited to join the Munich Hofoper (1919), and after two seasons moved to Vienna. In all, he sang some 150 roles with the Vienna Staatsoper from 1920 until he retired in 1964, and in addition he was active as a producer (Vienna, Oslo, Spain and Covent Garden – Der Rosenkavalier, 1960) and as a reviser of librettos. For two decades Jerger was a remarkably versatile singer at Vienna (Don Giovanni and Leporello, Sachs and Beckmesser, Méphistophélès, Scarpia, the Grand Inquisitor and King Philip II; he was also very successful in the title role of Krenek's Jonny spielt auf, and for many years his Pizarro and his Mozart roles were familiar at the Salzburg Festival). He was a renowned Strauss singer – Storch, Barak, John the Baptist, Orestes, Ochs and other parts; at Dresden in 1933 he created the role of Mandryka in Arabella, a part he sang at Covent Garden in 1934. At the end of World War II Jerger was appointed temporary director of the Vienna Staatsoper and was largely responsible for its being able to perform Le nozze di Figaro as early as May 1945. In 1947 he became a professor at the Vienna Music Academy (among his pupils was Leonie Rysanek), and at 80 he sang the Notary in Solti's Der Rosenkavalier recording. Between the wars Jerger made a series of fine recordings.

Jeritza, Maria [Mizzi] [Jedlitzka, Marie] (b Brno, 6 Oct 1887; d Orange, NJ, 10 July 1982). Moravian soprano, active in Austria and the USA. After studies in Brno and Prague, she made her début at Olmütz in 1910 as Elsa; she then joined the Vienna Volksoper and in 1912 appeared at the Hofoper. She quickly became an immense favourite in Vienna, where she sang regularly for over two decades; she was especially admired as Tosca, Minnie and Turandot, and in many Strauss roles. She was the first Ariadne in both versions of Ariadne auf Naxos (1912, Stuttgart; 1916, Vienna), and the first Empress in Die Frau ohne Schatten (1919, Vienna). Her Salome was a remarkably vivid assumption. Having sung Marietta in the first Vienna performance of Korngold's Die tote Stadt, she repeated this role for her Metropolitan début later in the same year (19 November 1921). Of greater musical significance was her Jenůfa in both the first Viennese (1918) and first New York (1924) performances of Janáček's opera. During the next 12 years she became recognized as the Metropolitan's most glamorous star since the days of Geraldine Farrar, and appropriately introduced to New York both Puccini's Turandot and Strauss's Die ägyptische Helena (see illustration). Her Covent Garden performances were confined to seven roles during 1925 and 1926, whereas at the Metropolitan she sang 290 performances in 20 roles. After World War II she made isolated appearances in Vienna and New York (having become a naturalized American). Though endowed with an ample and lustrous voice, Jeritza belonged to the category of artist known as a 'singing actress', freely yielding both dramatically and vocally to impulses that were sometimes more flamboyant than refined. In her numerous recordings, faults of taste and technique co-exist with genuine vocal achievements. Archival material from the Vienna Staatsoper in the 1930s testifies to the magnetic effect she had on audiences.

Jerome (b Stridon, Dalmatia, *c*341; d Bethlehem, 419/20). Saint, scholar and churchman. Born to wealthy Christian parents, he studied rhetoric in Rome under Donatus. Subsequently he sojourned in Gaul and Aquileia, becoming acquainted with monasticism and the ascetic life. He next spent several years in the East, where he perfected his Greek, learnt Hebrew, became versed in Origenist exegesis and finally was ordained at Antioch in 379. From 382 to 385 he was secretary to Pope Damasus at Rome and began his work of biblical translation that would eventually culminate in the version known as the Vulgate. At Rome he also became the centre of an ascetic circle of aristocratic women to whom he later directed rather severe advice in his much quoted letters. In 385 he retired to the Holy Land and there spent the rest of his life in literary activity and in directing his monastery and convents at Bethlehem.

Jerome's attitude towards ecclesiastical music was generally more rigorous than that of his contemporaries such as Ambrose, Augustine and Basil. He maintained that women ought to sing psalms alone in their rooms and not in crowded churches, and insisted that the efficacy of psalmody consisted not in its musical qualities but in the meaning of the words. He advocated, moreover, that his pious Roman correspondents observe the daunting monastic horarium of six Office hours and that their daughters learn the Psalter by heart.

Jerome's career as a biblical translator covered a period of some 22 years, from 383 in Rome to 405 in Bethlehem. Before he began this work, there was no unified edition of the Latin Bible. The so-called Old Latin Bible was in reality a variety of translations, particularly from Africa and Rome, of individual books and groups of books such as the Gospels and the Pentateuch. At Rome Jerome completed a translation of the Gospels and a revision of the Psalter. At Bethlehem he gained access to Origen's monumental Hexapla and translated several books from its edition of the Greek Septuagint, including the Psalter. But increasingly he turned to the Hebrew Bible, eventually translating from it virtually the entire Old Testament, issuing his work in separately prefaced books or combinations of books. It is quite possible that he never returned to work on the New Testament, so that his contribution to the Vulgate might very well be limited to the Gospels and the Old Testament.

Of special significance to the history of music are his three translations of the Psalter: the Roman revision of the Old Latin, the translation from the Septuagint and the translation from the Hebrew. At one time scholars identified the first of these with the so-called Psalterium romanum, the version from which most of the texts of the Gregorian Proper chants are derived. It is more widely believed now, however, that Jerome's first Psalter, though based on the Romanum and thus quite similar to it, has been lost. Of particular importance is his Psalter translated from the Septuagint. It was called the Psalterium gallicanum in the Middle Ages, because it appears to have been used in the liturgy in Gaul before Alcuin adopted it in his version of the Bible. Alcuin's version had a decisive influence on the eventual make-up of the Vulgate so that the Gallicanum came to occupy a position that belonged by rights to the translation from the Hebrew. The Gallicanum also furnished the texts for some Frankish chant Propers and came to be the version that was used in the medieval Office in all areas except Rome. Thus the Psalter from the Hebrew did not find a place in the liturgy; it figured chiefly in Psalters prepared for study, some of which show three versions in columnar form under the headings Romanum, Gallicanum and Hebraicum.

Jersild, Jørgen (b Copenhagen, 17 Sept 1913). Danish composer. He studied from 1931 with Schierbeck (theory and composition) and Alexander Stoffregen (piano). In 1936 he went to study with Roussel in Paris, where he became absorbed in learning orchestral technique, and from 1939 to 1943 he was programme secretary for Danish Radio. He took the MA in music at Copenhagen University in 1940, was appointed to the Copenhagen Conservatory in 1943 (professor 1953–75) and was also music critic for the Berlingske tidende from 1943 to 1958. He was chairman of the Music Teaching Society and a member of the Musikrådet from 1949 to 1953, a member of the State Arts Fund committee (1968–73) and a member of the Swedish Royal Academy of Music, Stockholm, from 1962.

Although Jersild's Trois pièces en concert (among the most important Danish postwar piano compositions) are in a brilliant French neo-classical piano style, the French influence in his music has to some extent been overshadowed and replaced by that clarity and artistic elegance which are characteristic of his entire output. Subsequent works, for example At spille i skoven and Pastorale, are more characteristically Danish and reveal the influence of Nielsen. Inspired by the Welsh harpist Osian Ellis, Jersild has composed a series of substantial works for solo harp and harp with other instruments, under the common title Libro d'arpa. These works mark a new departure in his music and are characterized by common thematic material, with movements developing from a simple thematic core by means of metamorphosis. Eloge for harp alone belongs to this set, and is based on the final scene of the film music for Gertrud. His Harp Concerto, performed by Ellis at the Aldeburgh Festival in 1972, is remarkable for its chamber-like scoring, especially the delicate wind writing at the opening. The music, though essentially melodic in conception, juxtaposes pentatonic and other modal collections in a sophisticated post-tonal harmonic language that is at times reminiscent of Britten. Also outstanding in Jersild's output are his beautiful works for unaccompanied choir, including the Tre madrigaler and the Tre romantiske korsange. In addition, he has exerted a significant pedagogic influence through his solfège studies in melody and rhythm, which have won acceptance at foreign academies. In late 1999, Jersild was honoured with the award of the Carl Nielsen-legat, in recognition of his contribution to 20th-century Danish music.

Jerusalem. City in Israel. It was formerly the capital of the British mandated territory of Palestine; on the formation of the state of Israel (1948), it was divided into the new city (capital of Israel) and the old city (Jordan), and in 1967 it came under Israeli administration.

See also JEWISH MUSIC, §II; PALESTINIAN MUSIC and ISRAEL.

1. Early history. 2. Modern history: (i) Religious musical traditions (ii) Western secular art music (iii) Musical broadcasts and education (iv) Resources.

1. EARLY HISTORY. The importance of Jerusalem as a music centre originated in the foundation by King DAVID of a central extra-tribal sanctuary, the Temple to Solomon or First Temple of Jerusalem, for which he laid down well-defined musical functions. A certain group of landless Levites was to devote itself entirely to music throughout all its generations. Although the principle of organized officialdom in cult music also existed elsewhere in ancient Asia, the Bible gives a detailed account of how it actually worked (1 Chronicles xv, xvi, xxiii and xxv). The first step (*c*1002 BCE) was the appointment of three elders to lead with cymbals the performance of 14 string players and seven trumpeters. This body of 24 musicians was based on the symbolic number of 12, which remained in force in both the First and the Second Temple of Jerusalem. About 970 BCE David fixed the total of active musicians at 288 (i.e. 24 x 12), and they were also given a kind of royal charter (1 Chronicles xxv.1–6).

The Temple music of Jerusalem excluded drums, rattles and other noisy instruments; its cymbals and trumpets were not sounded during the service. The prevalence of plucked strings accompanying a small choir indicates quiet, spiritual music, well suited to the inspired holiness of the psalms, which were to become the basis of sacred song through the ages. David and Solomon were regarded as the fathers of Hebrew poetry and song and later, in Christian times, as topoi of sacred music. Later court and urban music yielded to foreign influences (Isaiah v.11f). Temple music, however, was reformed by Hezekiah (*c*720 BCE) and Josiah (*c*625 BCE; 2 Chronicles xxix and xxxv).

After the Babylonian exile, the reconstruction of Temple music met with great difficulties and was accomplished only in 445 BCE (Nehemiah xii.27f). The Talmud reports on the splendid musical service of the second Temple period. Meanwhile Hellenism had obtruded on the musical life of the capital (Wisdom of Sirach xxxii.3f). Herod even inaugurated periodic games (Actiads) in 28 BCE, offering prizes for the best musicians (Josephus: Antiquities, xv.8.)

After the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE, the Roman colony founded on its site (130) was already an episcopal see, and under Constantine (*c*274–337) the Church of Jerusalem became a model for Christian services in both East and West. Its rites are said to have influenced the Roman liturgy under popes Damasus (366–84) and Leo (440–61), as well as the Spanish and Coptic churches; its melodies probably travelled together with the liturgical texts. Specific rites transferred 'de Hierosolymorum ecclesia' to the West are certain alleluias, the trisagion and the Adoration of the Cross. Modern research has traced certain melodic formulae and cadences of Byzantine and Ambrosian chant back to a common source in the Church of Jerusalem.

Byzantine liturgy was enriched by the Jerusalemite Patriarch Sophronius's famous Nativity hymns (see BYZANTINE CHANT), written shortly before the Muslim conquest (638). St Sabas's monastery developed a school of renowned kanōn-writers, including, in the 8th century, John Damascene and Kosmas of Jerusalem. Thereafter Jerusalem's importance for liturgy and music declined. Under the Muslims, it remained a minor provincial town; the churches were at variance with each other and the Jews stricken by insecurity and poverty: thus, the city long remained a mere meeting-place of divergent musical styles.

2. MODERN HISTORY. Musical life in modern Jerusalem can be divided into two separate spheres: the liturgical music of the various Jewish, Christian and Muslim religious communities who maintain their living musical traditions; and Western secular art music.

(i) Religious musical traditions. Most of the many Jewish religious musical traditions are represented in the synagogues of the various communities, the most ancient being of Middle Eastern origin, mainly from the Yemen, Baghdad, Kurdistan, Iran, Bokhara and Syria. On further investigation, these may prove to preserve elements of musical traditions from biblical times. There are also representatives of the musical traditions of Spanish-based Sephardi communities, especially those from North Africa, Greece and Turkey, as well as of the mainstreams of eastern European Ashkenazi tradition, namely Hasidism (which created in Jerusalem a special vocal style imitating instruments, stimulated by the ban on instrumental music imposed to signify mourning for the destruction of the Temple) and its opponents, Mithnagdim, who developed a Jerusalem version of the Lithuanian-style Bible cantillation. Western European communities, mainly from Germany, also have synagogues with their own musical traditions.

The most ancient Christian liturgical musical traditions practised in Jerusalem are those of the Eastern churches. The Armenian Orthodox church and monastery of St James, founded in the 4th century, maintains a male choir in its theological seminary (established 1843). Its library of Armenian manuscripts includes over 100 musical items, from the 14th century to the 16th, including hymnals with neumatic notation and illuminated Bibles with miniatures depicting instruments. The Ethiopian Orthodox church, which has been in Jerusalem since the 4th century, and the Greek Orthodox church, which maintains a choir in its theological seminary, both possess many ancient music manuscripts.

In 1934 the Gethsemane Convent, which has a nuns' choir, was attached to the Russian Orthodox church of St Mary Magdalene (1888). In Roman Catholic churches parts of the service are held in Arabic. At the church of St Sauveur, where an Italian organ was installed in 1910, the German organist and choral conductor P.E.J. von Hartmann (1863–1914) held office in 1893–4, and at the Anglican Christchurch Cathedral an organ was installed in 1851: Elizabeth Anne Finn, wife of the British consul, was the first organist. The Lutheran church of the Redeemer (1898) contained an organ presented by Kaiser Wilhelm II, which was replaced in 1971 by a new German instrument used for recitals from 1972. The organ of the Ascension church in the Augusta Victoria compound on the Mount of Olives was inaugurated in 1990. At the Benedictine Dormition Abbey, founded in 1906, a chamber organ was installed in 1980 and a large church organ in 1982.

(ii) Western secular art music. The history of Western secular art music in Jerusalem started in the late 19th century, when the first mass migrations of Jews to Palestine took place. However, the first European-style orchestra heard in Jerusalem was the Turkish Army Band, which played at Muslim festivals and at official functions, such as the visit of the Duke and Duchess of Brabant (1855), the opening of the railway station (1892) and the visit of Kaiser Wilhelm II (1898). Brass bands were also founded by the Christian Templars in the German colony (1885) and by the Syrian orphanage of the German-Protestant Schneller Foundation (1910).

The first chamber orchestra was founded in 1933 by Karel Salmon. The principal orchestra in the city is the Jerusalem SO of the Israel Broadcasting Authority, so named since 1973. It was founded in 1936 as a chamber orchestra of the Palestine Broadcasting Service. In 1938 it was reorganized as a symphony orchestra by Crawford McNair and Karel Salmon to form the Palestine Broadcasting Service Orchestra; it was renamed the Kol Israel Orchestra in 1948. Since 1939 its weekly concerts at the YMCA and, since 1975, the Jerusalem Theatre have been a regular feature of music in Jerusalem. The orchestra emphasizes the commissioning and performance of modern works, both Israeli and foreign, and encourages local soloists and conductors besides engaging guest artists. Outstanding among its conductors were Michael Taube, Georg Singer, Otto Klemperer, Heinz Freudenthal, Shalom Ronly-Riklis, Mendi Rodan, Lawrence Foster, Yoav Talmi, Sergiu Comissiona, Lukas Foss and Gary Bertini. David Shallon was appointed the orchestra's principal conductor in 1992. Works that had their première in Jerusalem include Milhaud's David (1954), Stravinsky's Abraham and Isaac (1964) and Dallapiccola's Exhortatio (1971).

The Jerusalem Chamber Orchestra was formed from among the radio orchestra's string players in 1964, but was disbanded in 1969. The Israel Camerata chamber orchestra, founded in 1991 by Arner Biron, moved to Jerusalem from Rehorot in 1996 and gives regular subscription concerts. A municipal youth brass band was founded in 1959 by Yohanan Boehm. The Hillel Hebrew University Orchestra, consisting of students, faculty members, new immigrant musicians and volunteers, was founded by Anita Kamien in 1989.

There have been numerous Jewish and Christian choral societies in Jerusalem. The first known secular choral society, Shirat Yisrael, was founded in 1901 by S.Z. Rivlin and was remodelled in 1910 by Abraham Zvi Idelsohn to maintain the musical traditions of the various Jewish communities. In 1917 Idelsohn founded the larger Habamah Haivrith Choir to perform Hebrew songs at concerts and official functions. The Palestine Broadcasting Service assembled a temporary chamber choir for its first-day programme in 1936. In 1938 the Palestine Broadcasting Service Choral Society was founded by Crawford McNair, and after its dissolution in 1948 at the end of the British mandate, the Zionist World Organization Broadcasting Service established the Kol Zion Lagola Choir (1951) under Marc Lavry; it was later taken over by the Israel Broadcasting Service, renamed the Kol Israel Choir (1958) and dissolved in 1971. These radio choirs were the principal choral organizations of their time. The Shem Choir, established in 1936 by the National Council of Palestine Jews under Max Lampel, functioned until 1948, mainly to provide Jewish music for radio programmes, while the radio choirs concentrated on classical music. The main choral society after 1970 was the Jerusalem Chamber Choir of the Rubin Academy, founded in 1969 by Arner Itai. In 1987 the Jerusalem Oratorio Choir was established. The Opus Singers vocal ensemble was founded in 1989 under the directorship of Oscar Gershenson; the group was renamed A Cappella in 1994.

With the establishment of the Jerusalem Musical Society (1921–37), chamber music assumed greater importance in the city. The Jerusalem String Quartet, founded in 1922, was renamed the Women's Quartet in 1930, and reverted to its former name when Emil Hauser became its leader in 1934; it was active until 1939. From 1938 the Palestine Broadcasting Service (later the Israel Broadcasting Authority) was the chief promoter of concerts. The Jerusalem Musicians' Association organized chamber music concerts after 1945 and continued as the Jerusalem Chamber Music Society until 1975. The Caprisma Ensemble was founded in 1991 to perform mainly 20th-century music. The Israel Contemporary Players ensemble was also founded in 1991 to perform 20th-century chamber music. It consists mainly of Jerusalem Symphony Orchestra members. The Israel Museum has organized chamber concerts since 1969.

Jerusalem never possessed a hall intended especially for music until 1986, when the Henry Crown Symphony Hall was completed at the Jerusalem Theatre. Musical and literary evenings were held at the Feingold Hall from 1910, but this has fallen into disuse. The first large halls in the city were cinemas, which together with the YMCA auditorium served for orchestral and operatic performances, while school halls were used for smaller orchestras and chamber music. Orchestral concerts are held at the Jerusalem International Convention Centre (1958; fig.1) and the Jerusalem Theatre (1971; fig.2), while chamber music was performed at the Khan (a renovated Turkish caravanserai) until 1983 and is now given at the Rubin Music Academy, the Ticho House art gallery (since 1986) and the Targ Music Centre. The Sultan's Pool, an ancient former reservoir, has been used for occasional large-scale open-air performances of opera and other events since 1978.

Since the 1950s Jerusalem has been associated with several festivals and competitions, some local and some international. The Zimriyyah World Assembly of Jewish Choirs, a triennial choral festival initiated in 1952 by Aron Zvi Propes, holds some of its concerts in Jerusalem. The Abu Ghosh-Kiryat Yearim Music Festival, held annually from 1957 to 1971, and again since 1992, at a Catholic church in an Arab village near the city, is devoted mainly to church music and given chiefly by Jewish artists. The first round of the triennial International Harp Competition, inaugurated in 1959, also by Propes, is held in Jerusalem, and the Israel Festival, held every summer from 1961, was transferred in 1982 from the Caesarea Roman Amphitheatre to Jerusalem. Testimonium, a concert series organized by Recha Freier every two or three years, commissioned from 1968 to 1983 works from Israeli and foreign composers to give musical expression to important events of Jewish history. A popular song festival has been held annually since 1963 by the Israel Broadcasting Authority on Israel's independence day.

(iii) Musical broadcasts and education. The Palestine Broadcasting Service has had a music department since its inception under Karel Salmon. Under British management the service aimed at balanced broadcasts to the Christian, Jewish and Arab sectors. From 1948 a heavier emphasis was placed on Israeli music, but an orchestra of traditional Near Eastern instruments was also established; for Christian listeners, programmes of sacred music have been introduced, and religious holiday services are transmitted live from various churches. A special network for broadcasts of classical music, named The Voice of Music, was established in 1983.

2. Jerusalem Theatre, opened 1971

The first institution for musical education in Jerusalem was Shirat Yisrael, founded in 1909 by Idelsohn and Rivlin to train cantors in the various musico-liturgical traditions of the Jewish communities and to make a systematic collection of traditional chants. In 1910 the first secular music school, Shulamith, was founded by Shulamith Ruppin, but survived only until 1912. The British military governor Ronald Storrs founded the Jerusalem School of Music in 1919, in collaboration with Idelsohn; it was directed initially by the violinist Anton Tchaikov and from 1922 by Sidney Seal. In 1932 the school of Music and Movement Art was founded on the initiative of cellist Thelma Yellin, with violinist Schlomo Garter as director. In 1933 it was renamed the Palestine Conservatory of Music and Dramatic Art, and Emil Hauser was appointed its director; it included a seminar for school teachers of music from 1939. In 1947 a group of teachers separated from the institute and founded the New Jerusalem Academy and Conservatory of Music, renamed the Jerusalem Rubin Academy of Music in 1958. The older conservatory closed down in 1952. A conservatory for schoolchildren and, since 1960, a secondary school of music are connected with the academy, which has had its own building since 1958, including an electronic music laboratory and a museum of instruments containing the collection of Sergei Koussevitzky.

At the Hebrew University of Jerusalem (1925) a department of musicology opened in 1965, offering, besides the regular curriculum, historical and ethnomusicological courses in Jewish, Israeli and oriental music. The Archive of Oriental Music was founded at the university in 1935 by Robert Lachmann and functioned until his death in 1939. The university's Jewish Music Research Centre, founded in 1964 by Israel Adler, conducts historical and ethnomusicological research. It publishes Yuval (a periodical collection of research papers on Jewish music), the Yuval Monograph Series and a record anthology of traditional music. The Israel Centre for Electronic Music was founded in 1960 by Josef Tal and later became part of the university.

(iv) Resources. The World Centre for Jewish Music was founded in 1938, with the support of such composers as Bloch, Milhaud and Weill, to promote Jewish music internationally; however, because of the political situation before World War II, it lasted less than two years, having published only one number of its periodical Musica hebraica. Its archives are in the Jewish National and University Library's music department. The Israel Institute for Sacred Music, founded in 1955 by Avigdor Herzog, arranges lectures, conferences and concerts, publishes scores, books and periodicals and makes field recordings, all of Jewish religious music. The Israel Composers' Fund was established in 1958 by Recha Freier to commission works from Israeli composers. It functioned until 1975. The Jerusalem Music Centre Mishkenot Sha'ananim was founded in 1976 by Isaac Stern to conduct masterclasses and workshops. The centre is equipped with an audio and video recording studio and also holds chamber concerts and recitals.

One of the largest collections of Jewish music is held in the Jewish National and University Library, which developed from a collection started in 1884 and has a music department containing the archives of Joseph Achron, Friedrich Gernsheim, Idelsohn and Lachmann. Since 1964 it has also contained the National Sound Archives, which hold disc recordings of Idelsohn, disc and cylinder recordings of Lachmann; the Archives for Jewish and Oriental Music, founded by Edith Gerson-Kiwi in 1947 as a department of the Palestine Institute of Folklore and Ethnology; and a large collection of original tape recordings of Jewish and oriental traditional music. Other specialized collections are the AMLI music library (1958) at the Rubin Academy of Music; the Israel Broadcasting Authority record library; and the Jaromir Weinberger Archive, in the possession of Weinberger's nephew Yehuda Polacek.

Jerusalem [Hyerusalem; Hierusalem], Ignacio [Gerusalemme, Ignazio] (b Lecce, 3 June 1707; d Mexico City, 15 Dec 1769). Mexican composer and violinist of Italian birth. His father, Matteo Martino Gerusalemme (b 1667), was a violinist at the Jesuit church in Lecce. In 1742, while active as a theatre musician in Cádiz, Ignazio was persuaded to leave for Mexico City by Josef Cárdenas, the administrator of the Real Hospital de Naturales, who was in Cádiz to recruit musicians and actors for the Antiguo Coliseo in Mexico City. Jerusalem and his companions, who included singers, dancers and instrumentalists, began arriving at Mexico City at the end of 1743, their performances beginning in the spring of the following year. Jerusalem became director of the Coliseo, where he established a reputation as a gifted composer. In June 1746 he entered the service of Mexico City Cathedral, composing villancicos and teaching at the Colegio de Infantes.

Jerusalem found himself at loggerheads with Domingo Dutra, an indifferent musician who had been the cathedral's interim maestro de capilla since 1739, when Zumaya left. Dutra had proved inept as both composer and choir director, and in 1749 the chapter moved to force him into retirement. In April 1750 Jerusalem applied for the post and after a rigorous examination was appointed maestro de capilla on 3 November 1750. The capilla flourished under his guidance. According to Juan de Viera, writing in 1777 (see Obregón), Jerusalem directed the orchestra and choir in musical performances nearly every day, and 'the Music Chapel [was] the most select, skilful and knowledgeable of the chapels in America'. Viera overheard a group of Europeans saying that 'such magnificence is not to be found in Toledo or Seville', and that 'they seemed to be more like a choir of angels than of humans'. Soon after Jerusalem's appointment as maestro de capilla his health failed, and he also had to confront a threat to his economic security in the early 1750s, when he complained that musicians from other parishes and churches were usurping fees that previously he had received for funerals, processions and other special occasions.

Jerusalem's Matins service for Maundy Thursday 1753 scored a success that was still remembered decades later, but during the next couple of years he faced three major crises. The first was at the Coliseo. As he ascended in the cathedral hierarchy Jerusalem shed his obligations to the Coliseo, until he finally resigned altogether; however, he then faced charges of embezzlement as he had not settled outstanding bills before leaving. Simultaneously he was brought before the cathedral chapter on yet another charge. His wife Antonia had gone to live with her brother and was asking that the chapter pay him some of her husband's wages. Jerusalem defended himself, saying that much of the debt owed to the Coliseo had been incurred by his wife; he pleaded with the chapter not to withhold his wages and entreated them to help with professional expenses, observing that he personally had been paying the poet and copyist for his major compositions. The third scandal of this period concerned Tollis de la Roca's appointment at the cathedral, to which Jerusalem strongly objected. Jerusalem went to great lengths to ensure the establishment of Tollis's second-class status in the cathedral hierarchy.

In spite of a life marked by turmoil and questionable decisions, Jerusalem made a series of clear-headed musical reforms that influenced Mexican music for the rest of the century. He advocated the sole use of modern notation and the abandonment of white notation still employed in New World cathedrals. He insisted on a measure of literary reform, expressing particular displeasure in 1753 with the obtuse poetry of Francisco de Selma, who had been supplying texts in the New World for 33 years after leaving his native Segovia. He also succeeded in convincing the cathedral chapter in 1759 that changes in musical styles made it necessary to acquire extra instruments and instrumentalists.

The last ten years of Jerusalem's life were extremely productive and tranquil. The highly crafted masses, the vespers psalms and most of the liturgical cycles date from this period. In one last legal battle he tried to halt the creation of a new capilla under the auspices of the Royal University of Mexico. At a royal hearing on 26 May 1769 he instructed any would-be freelance musicians that they would be allowed to play only in the location of their primary employment. On his death the cathedral chapter acknowledged Jerusalem's faithful service, especially during the last ten years of his life, and compiled an inventory of the music he had composed. His works continued to be used in Mexico City for many years, and were probably performed in the California Missions into the 19th century. His influence was felt through much of the Spanish-speaking world.

Jerusalem's works are steeped in the galant style: rhythmic variety abounds, harmonic rhythm is slow and homophonic textures predominate. They show a predilection for lombardic rhythms, which were rarely heard previously in Mexico. Even a short phrase will often contain a host of rhythmic ideas in the upper parts, while the bass lines are often stationary and rhythmically plain. Textures are usually homophonic or, in prominent locations such as an opening introductory statement of a theme, boldly monophonic. Opening ritornellos are often short, followed by a full statement of the main theme with the choir and orchestra all doubling at the unison or in octaves: only later, as a movement progresses, are his remarkable contrapuntal skills revealed, as in the motivic interplay in the second responsory for the feast of St Joseph or the fugues that appear in the 'Christe eleison' sections of his Kyrie movements or the concluding 'Amen' sections of his Gloria settings. His fugues recall the translucent exuberance of Mozart rather than the severity of the north German high Baroque. It is probably the unassuming homophonic settings and singing style that initially shocked the Mexico City Cathedral establishment, who expected rigorous counterpoint at every turn. In most pieces the harmonic rhythm accelerates gradually as the music unfolds, and the excitement is heightened by an increase in surface rhythms and vigorous instrumental figuration that propels the piece forward.

Jerusalem's music reveals an impressive command of large-scale forms. He often divided texts such as the Gloria, Credo or a vespers psalm into smaller 'numbers', each with different vocal resources. These numbers are usually organized symmetrically, with large choral numbers occurring at the extremes, small ensembles or soloists forming the second and penultimate numbers, and a brief chorus serving as a central fulcrum. The first chorus tends to be the longest section, with the most active figuration, and the concluding chorus is the most thrilling – either a fugue or a joyous caper in compound metre. In his solo arias Jerusalem placed a premium on vocal pyrotechnics and virtuosity.

CRAIG H. RUSSELL

Jerusalem, Siegfried (b Oberhausen, 17 April 1940). German tenor. After 17 years as an orchestral bassoonist he studied singing at Stuttgart, making his début there in 1975 as First Prisoner in Fidelio. He sang his first major Wagner role, Lohengrin, in several leading German houses, including Berlin, where he became a member of the Deutsche Oper in 1978. At Bayreuth he has sung Froh, the Young Sailor (Tristan; 1977), Parisfal, Walther and Lohengrin (1979–81), Siegmund (1983–6), Siegfried (1988–92), Tristan (1993–5) and Loge (1994–5). Having made his Metropolitan début in 1980 as Lohengrin, he returned as Loge (1987), Siegfried (1990–91) and Parsifal (1992). He first sang at Covent Garden, as Erik, in 1986. Although his repertory includes Tamino, Florestan (both of which he has recorded), Idomeneus, Gluck's Orestes (a high baritone part), Max (Freischütz), Don Alvaro (Forza del destino), Lensky, Boris (Kát'a Kabanová) and Assad (Königin von Saba), his powerful, expressive voice and dramatic involvement are shown to best advantage in his Wagner roles, above all Siegfried, which he has sung with notable success in Berlin, Vienna and at Covent Garden (1995–6), and has recorded with both Haitink and Barenboim. Jersualem is also an admired concert singer, and has made impressive recordings of such works as Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Das Lied von der Erde and Gurrelieder.

Jeske-Choińska-Mikorska, Ludmiła (b Małachów, nr Poznań, 1849; d Warsaw, 2 Nov 1898). Polish composer. She studied singing with Marchesi in Vienna, Lamperti in Milan, Révial in Paris and Julius Stockhausen in Frankfurt. She also studied theory at the Paris Conservatoire; later in Warsaw she had lessons in composition with M. Zawirski, Gustaw Roguski and Zygmunt Noskowski, and in orchestration with Adam Münchheimer. She taught in Poznań from 1877, and later in Warsaw. She was a gifted composer, particularly of tuneful songs and comic operas. For her ballad Rusałka and operatic overtures she was awarded a special diploma at the World's Columbian Exposition, Chicago, in 1893 and was honoured at the 1894 exhibition at Antwerp. She was married to the writer Teodor Choiński and wrote a novel, Muzykanci, which was published as a serial in the weekly Rola (1884). Some of her compositions were published by Gebethner in Warsaw.

IRENA PONIATOWSKA

Jessel, Leon (b Stettin [now Szczecin], 22 Jan 1871; d Berlin, 4 Jan 1942). German composer. After studying music with various teachers from 1888 to 1891, he took up positions as a conductor in Gelsenkirchen and Mülheim and in 1894 at the summer theatre in Celle where his first one-act work was produced. Further engagements followed in Freiberg (1894), Paderborn (1895), Stettin (1896), Chemnitz (1897–1900) and Neustrelitz. He then settled in Lübeck, devoting himself to the composition of popular pieces which included Die Parade der Zinnsoldaten op.123 (1905) and Der Rose Hochzeitszug op.216. In 1911 he moved to Berlin and composed many operettas, of which Schwarzwaldmädel (1917) established a firm place in the German operetta repertory. It was, however, in a more traditional style than was currently in vogue, and none of his later works approached it in popularity. Jessel was a composer of considerable technical accomplishment, and Schwarzwaldmädel especially is not only a work of outstanding melodic invention but also shows a grasp of dramatic development reminiscent of Millöcker and other classical operetta composers.

ANDREW LAMB

Jessye, Eva (Alberta) (b Coffeyville, KS, 20 Jan 1885; d Ann Arbor, MI, 21 Feb 1992). American choral director, composer and arranger. She studied at Western University, Kansas (graduated 1914), and Langston University, Langston, Oklahoma. After teaching in the public schools, she became the director of music at Morgan College, Baltimore, in 1920. In 1926, a year after joining the staff at the Baltimore Afro-American, she moved to New York to study with Will Marion Cook and Percy Goetschius. By 1930 her Original Dixie Jubilee Singers (later the Eva Jessye Choir), an ensemble that performed spirituals, work-songs, mountain ballads, ragtime jazz and light opera, were popular on both stage and radio, appearing regularly on the 'Major Bowes Family Radio Hour' and the 'General Motors Hour'. The first black woman to win international distinction as a choral director, she and her choir performed throughout the world and in numerous Broadway shows and motion pictures, the first being King Vidor's Hallelujah (MGM, 1929). In 1934 she served as choral director for Gertrude Stein and Virgil Thomson's Four Saints in Three Acts and in 1935 was asked by George Gershwin to direct the chorus for Porgy and Bess, a position she held until 1958. She also acted as an adviser for the BBC's For the Children: Huckleberry Finn and Down in the Valley (1952). In 1963 her choir was designated the official chorus of Martin Luther King's civil rights march on Washington, DC. After her retirement in 1971, she established the Eva Jessye Afro-American Music Collection at the University of Michigan and Pittsburg State University (Kansas). She received many honorary doctorates and was a member of ASCAP and the Negro Actors' Guild.

Jester's flute (Ger. Narrenflöte). A trick instrument in the shape of a recorder, where the bottom bulge of the head joint is hollow, filled with flour or soot, which soils the unsuspecting player blowing into the instrument. Due to a case of mistaken identity the name was also applied to the EUNUCH-FLUTE.

Jesuits [Society of Jesus]. A Roman Catholic religious order of priests and brothers that grew out of an association of men who formed themselves around Ignatius Loyola (1491–1556), a minor Basque nobleman. Dedicated to 'the progress of souls in Christian life and doctrine and to the propagation of the faith', the order was inaugurated by Pope Paul III in a bull of 1540. Jesuit history falls into two periods: 1540 to 1773 and 1814 to the present (the intervening years represent the period of suppression). This article focusses on the first period, the more significant as regards the musical involvement of the order.

1. Early history. 2. Missions. 3. Musical legacy.

1. EARLY HISTORY. Jesuit spirituality is rooted in the experience of the gospels as reflected upon in the Ejercicios espirituales, a manual of spiritual exercises developed by Ignatius. These exercises gave rise to a new kind of ministry, that of the retreat or time set apart for private prayer, which further generated an outward, missionary concern for service to others. The early works of the order consisted of preaching, hearing confessions, teaching Christian doctrine to children, visiting the sick and imprisoned, and guiding persons in the practice of the exercises. To ensure the flexibility of this vocation and its itinerant nature, Ignatius and his first followers stipulated that the common recitation or chanting of the liturgical hours, hitherto an integral part of the daily life of a religious order, would not be required. The members were therefore able to be out in the world at the service of the gospel, ministering to the people, rather than bound together in the common recitation of the psalms.

In 1548 an important new direction came about with the foundation of the first Jesuit college, sponsored by the order in Messina, Sicily. By 1560, with the success of this college and others, education had been defined as the order's primary ministry. Because of the different needs of the students, the constitutional ban on the use of liturgical music and musical instruments in Jesuit houses could no longer be strictly observed, if indeed it ever was.

Music came to be used as part of the Society's apostolic ministry in four principal contexts: in liturgical and paraliturgical services within the order's churches and colleges; in college dramatic productions; in college academic assemblies and public disputations; and in the Marian Congregations (pious societies of students dedicated to the Blessed Virgin) within the colleges. Since the order had no previous connection with a particular musical tradition, and none had been prescribed in its Constitutions, that which developed did so almost wholly by default: the work in which the Jesuits became involved demanded certain levels of musical participation; for example, music was required for services in parish and collegiate churches.

Until the founding of the Roman Seminary in 1564, most of the statutes concerning music dealt with the need for musical training within the curricula of the various colleges. Generally speaking, the Jesuits were neither composers nor maestri di cappella, and in the early years music masters were engaged by the colleges to teach the students, both clerical and lay. The earliest reference to the performance of liturgical music in a Jesuit college is that by Jerome Nadal, principal assistant to the Jesuit General in Rome, in a set of instructions written for the college in Vienna in 1566. Polyphony was allowed for the Ordinary of the Mass and the Magnificat at Vespers; the other vesper psalms were limited to falsobordone and everything else was to be sung to Gregorian chant. Exceptions were allowed on special feast days but only with the permission of the rector of the college or the provincial. As Jesuit institutions grew up during the 16th century and became stabilized throughout Europe, it appears that the musical practices permitted in Jesuit chapels conformed more or less to Nadal's instructions of 1566. However, various other documents provide interesting information concerning, for example, the use of motets in the liturgy, the paraliturgical services and devotional services such as the Friday afternoon Passion meditations that took place in Jesuit churches with increasing frequency after 1600, the Quarant'hore service, popular in the 17th century, and the music for the Marian Congregations (later called the Sodalities of the Blessed Virgin).

With the vast proliferation of Jesuit colleges in Europe in the late 16th century, music was established as a normal part of the curriculum, especially when allied to the dramatic arts with which Jesuit education came to be so identified. Since dramatic works could often act as a living catechism of Christian doctrine, they became important vehicles for the order's apostolic work. The first drama mentioned together with its music was the Acolastus, performed in Lisbon in 1556. In 1606 Agostino Agazzari composed the Eumelio for the carnival celebrations of the Seminario Romano, and by 1622, the year that Ignatius Loyola and Francis Xavier (one of the order's founding members) were canonized, the Collegio Romano sponsored the performance of three complete dramas in celebration of the event. One of these, J.H. Kapsberger's Apotheosis sive Consecratio SS Ignatii et Francisci Xaverii (in F-Pn), more properly belongs to the genre of early opera, for the text by the Jesuit Orazio Grassi was set to music in a fully mounted production of five acts. The other two dramas, Vincenzo Guiniggi's Ignatius in Monte Serrato arma mutans and Alessandro Donati's Pirimalo (the music for both is lost), made extensive use of chorus and dancing. During the 17th and 18th centuries throughout Europe the texts of hundreds of such plays were written, many of which are extant (in more than one language), although the music has rarely survived.

Within the colleges, a system of awards was instituted to encourage serious study. In the late 16th century the award ceremonies, to which the public and local dignitaries were often invited, began to take on significant musical importance, choruses being specially composed for the occasion. Music was also composed for the ceremonies at which theses were defended in public; none of this music now exists, but the texts of choruses are frequently to be found printed on the surviving pamphlets (in I-Rv) advertising the defences of particular students. The Marian Congregations provided similar opportunity for musical performance, and motets and sacred madrigals were sung in processions and at devotional meetings and formal paraliturgical ceremonies.

2. MISSIONS. The Jesuit order maintained a highly centralized administrative structure, assuring efficient communication throughout the provinces and extending to the colleges. One of the more interesting by-products of this structure as regards the Jesuit musical tradition was the use and development of music in the foreign missions. Even though Jesuits in mission territories shared the same vision as their European brothers, the missionary context often dictated a more flexible, less cautious approach to the use of music in support of the order's apostolic enterprise. The musical tradition that developed in a large number of mission countries was, in fact, so successful that it is now possible to identifiy 'mission music' as a genre distinct from the cathedral music that existed in those countries.

In the 'Jesuit republic' of Paraguay, for example, where the order was present from 1607 to the time of its expulsion from Spanish lands in 1767, the Society established separate townships for the Guaraní Indians and several other indigenous peoples. Virtually every town of about 2000 members boasted its own orchestra, and several of the larger towns were set up as conservatories or as factory towns for making musical instruments. Jesuits would constantly ask their European colleagues to send the most recently composed music to the townships, and a musical trade route developed between Europe and the La Plata basin of Argentina whereby Jesuit musicians and artists as well as music scores could be channelled to the South American jungles. The order sent several musicians to Paraguay, among them Antonius Sepp (1655–1733), once a member of the boys' choir at the Stephansdom in Vienna, who set up one of the Guaraní towns as a conservatory so that Indians from all the other towns could be trained in the art of music and instrument building.

As the Jesuits brought Western art music to far-flung lands, they were also the agents for a reverse kind of cultural borrowing. Perhaps the most borrowed of Chinese tunes, wannian huan, was first brought to the knowledge of Western readers in a geographical work by the French Jesuit Jean-Baptiste Du Halde (1674–1743) in 1733. The tune was quoted in Rousseau's Dictionnaire de musique of 1768. Although a mistake in copying ruined the original pentatonic, the tune nevertheless served as the main motif of Weber's Overtura chinesa of 1806 (lost), which the composer later used as prelude to his incidental music to Schiller's Turandot (1809). The second-hand borrowing continued in Puccini's Turandot (1926) and in the scherzo of Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes by Carl Maria von Weber (1943). It was not only in the more famous missions like Paraguay or China, however, that music played an important role in the Society's missionary activity; it now appears that India, the Philippines, and indeed all of East Asia were subject to such influence.

3. MUSICAL LEGACY. As mentioned above (§1), the Society of Jesus was founded with an institutional bias against musical practice. Even though the reason for that bias was not in itself anti-musical, a certain degree of suspicion about music was generated within the ranks of the order; there were always members who felt that music was dangerous because of its ability to stir the emotions, thereby evoking sensuality, and they argued that music should therefore not be accorded a significant place within the Jesuit tradition. It was in spite of this bias that a worthy musical tradition developed throughout the early years of the order, and by the mid-17th century the principal arguments about music in Jesuit colleges and chapels concerned matters of finance. From the beginning, although Jesuits themselves may have been cautioned against or even prevented from a deep involvement in the musical arts, the Society nevertheless appointed some of the finest musicians available to be maestri di cappella, especially at the Jesuit colleges in Rome, including the Collegio Romano, the Collegio Germanico, the Seminario Romano and the Collegio Inglese. At one time or another Palestrina, Victoria, Agostino Agazzari, G.F. Anerio, Domenico Massenzio, J.H. Kapsberger and Giacomo Carissimi all worked for the Jesuits, as did M.-A. Charpentier and André Campra in France at a later date.

Throughout the Society's history, there have nevertheless been a number of composers, musicians and scholars who were themselves members of the order. Francisco Borgia (1510–72), former Duke of Gandía and third Father General, was known to have composed a polyphonic mass setting. The polymath Athanasius Kircher (1601–80) was one of the most influential music theorists of the Baroque era. Domenico Zipoli (1688–1726) from Prato, sometime organist at the Gesù in Rome, entered the Society in 1716 and spent the rest of his life using his musical talents in the Jesuit reducciones of Paraguay. After Zipoli, the musician and architect Martin Schmid (1694–1772) dominated the history of the last days of the Jesuits in Paraguay immediately before their expulsion in 1767, while the French Jesuit composer Joseph Amiot (1718–93) worked at the close of the Jesuit period in China. A number of Jesuits have been more renowned for their scholarly research in music: Louis Lambillotte (1796–1855), chant scholar and composer of hymns; G.M. Dreves (1854–1909), medievalist and co-editor of Analecta Hymnica Medii Aevi; J.W.A. Vollaerts (1901–56), chant scholar; and Jóse López-Calo (b 1922), influential musicologist in the field of Spanish sources.

Much documentation exists about the music of the Jesuits before the order's suppression by Pope Clement XIV in 1773, but very little of the music itself seems to have survived. Apart from the Kapsberger opera, the other collections of music manuscripts linked to the Society have come to light mostly outside the European orbit, and virtually all of that music is connected with the Jesuit mission lands. The most substantial manuscript collection is that of the episcopal archive in Concepción, Bolivia, but music associated with the Society has also been found in Brazil, Canada (Quebec), Chile, Colombia, Mexico and the Philippines. A collection of printed music, most of it dating from the 19th century but with a few 16th–18th-century prints, was discovered in the early 1990s in the church of the Gesù, Rome (it is now part of the Jesuit archive in I-Rcg). The disappearance of music manuscripts and prints belonging to the Jesuits is probably a result of the suppression; while some Jesuit libraries survived or were reconstituted after the restoration of the order in 1814, music from the college chapels and churches associated with the professed houses did not.

Jeté (Fr.: 'thrown'). In string playing, a bowstroke that bounces or ricochets off the string. P. Baillot (L'art du violon, Paris, 1834) gave détaché jetté as a synonym for staccato à ricochet. The number of rebounds specified by composers generally varies between two and six.

In French Baroque viol playing the jetté (discussed by Loulié in his Méthode pour apprendre à jouer la viole, MS, F-Pn f.fr.n.a.6355) is essentially a basic bowstroke without the initial attack; as such it consists of the 'release' component of the 'pressure–release' gesture fundamental to the basic viol bowstroke. The jetté is not normally an isolated bowstroke, but rather appears as part of a multiple-bow gesture or in conjunction with a preceding bowstroke. For further information see J. Hsu: A Handbook of French Baroque Viol Technique (New York, 1981).

Jethro Tull. English rock group. Formed in 1967 in Blackpool, it began as a blues-based rock band led by Ian Anderson (b Edinburgh, 10 Aug 1947; flute, guitar and vocals). The group's style soon developed away from its blues roots as it became one of the leading groups in British progressive rock between 1970 and 1977. After early successes with This Was (Isl., 1968), Stand Up (Isl., 1969) and Benefit (Isl., 1970), the band released their most commercially successful album, Aqualung (Isl., 1971). With thoughtful lyrics and complex arrangements, it was Jethro Tull's first album in the progressive style; it became a staple of 1970s FM radio and was very influential. Thick as a Brick (Chrysalis, 1972) is one of the decade's most important and ambitious concept albums, consisting of one long track of over 40 minutes, based on a poem by the precocious but fictitious eight-year old, Gerald Bostock. Thick as a Brick offers a stinging critique of provincial British life, and the LP was originally packaged as part of a fold-out 12-page newspaper, The St. Cleve Chronicle. A Passion Play (Chrysalis, 1973) focussed on life after death and rebirth, and was packaged with a theatre programme containing the lyrics. Songs from the Wood (Chrysalis, 1977) saw the band returning to a simpler style, influenced heavily by traditional British folk music. Jethro Tull has remained active in the 1980s and 90s, even winning a Grammy Award for Crest of a Knave (Chrysalis, 1987).

JOHN COVACH

Jeths, Willem (b Amersfoort, 31 Aug 1959). Dutch composer. He studied music education at the Sweelinck Conservatory, Amsterdam (1980–2), then composition at the Utrecht Conservatory (1982–8), where his lecturers were Kox and subsequently Keuris. At the same time he studied musicology at the University of Amsterdam (1983–91). He wrote a master's thesis on Elisabeth Kuyper, the results of which were published, in collaboration with P. Lelieveldt, in Zes vrouwelijke componisten (ed. H. Metzelaar, Zutphen, 1991).

Jeths's compositions, freely atonal in idiom, include orchestral works, chamber music and songs. In his own words, he strives 'to indicate the skeleton, the essence of the music. I attempt to put this into effect in an unadorned style in which concentrated musical thought is combined with special attention to pure sound and ferocious rhythm'. His feeling for texture and sonority is evident in his violin concerto Glenz, in which a further nine soloists within the string orchestra, employing scordatura and a broad chromatic spectrum of harmonics, are played off against the solo violin.

His awards include the second public prize of the competition organized by BUMA (the Dutch agency for musical copyright) in 1993 (for Novelette), the honorary diploma of the Weber String Quartet Competition in 1991 (for Arcate), and the second prize at the International Vienna Competition in 1995 (for Glenz).

Jeune, Claude le. See LE JEUNE, CLAUDE.

Jeune France, La. French group of composers: Baudrier, Daniel-Lesur, Jolivet and Messiaen. After hearing a performance of Messiaen's Les offrandes oubliées in 1935, Baudrier determined to bring together a group of young French composers united by common spiritual goals (partly as a reaction to the two loosely-constituted groups of Satie's aesthetic disciples, Les Six and the Ecole d'Arcueil). Messiaen readily agreed to participate, and suggested Daniel-Lesur and Jolivet as other members. Jehan Alain was also invited to join, but declined. In consultation with the other three composers, Baudrier wrote the manifesto for La Jeune France, first published in the programme for its inaugural concert (Salle Gaveau, 3 June 1936):

> As life becomes increasingly strenuous, mechanistic and impersonal, music must seek always to give spiritual excitement to those who love it . . . La Jeune France intends to promote the performance of works which are youthful and free, standing apart from academic or revolutionary clichés. The tendencies of the group are diverse; their common aim is simply to encourage the values of sincerity, generosity and artistic awareness; its goal is to create and foster a living music.

As well as works by its four members, the first concert also included Tailleferre's Piano Concerto, with Viñes as soloist and Désormière conducting. A second concert, given on 4 June 1937, under Désormière, included the first performance of the orchestral version of 'Action de grâces' from Messiaen's Poèmes pour Mi (sung by Marcelle Bunlet), and works by Arrieu and Delannoy. Alain had remained on friendly terms with the group and some of his finest organ works (including Litanies) were given first performances at a Jeune France concert in La Trinité, Paris, on 17 February 1938.

After the liberation of Paris, La Jeune France continued to give occasional concerts as Les Amis de La Jeune France; these included a performance of Messiaen's Quatuor pour la fin du temps at the house of Guy-Bernard Delapierre on 25 May 1945.

NIGEL SIMEONE

Jeunesses Musicales. International organization. It was initiated in Belgium in 1940 by Marcel Cuvelier in order to propagate live music and related arts in schools, universities and among working youth, regardless of political or doctrinaire considerations. It has established an effective international network of artistic exchanges, bringing many young performers before the public through concert tours and competitions; it also encourages performance by young people by establishing music camps and forming international orchestras directed by outstanding conductors. In keeping with its broad humanitarian aims it was a founder-member of the International Music Council in 1949. The first Jeunesses Musicales concert was in the Palais des Beaux-Arts, Brussels, on 17 October 1940. The movement spread to France in the following year through the efforts of René Nicoly, and in 1945 the Fédération Internationale des Jeunesses Musicales (FIJM) was founded; its first international congress was in 1946. The founders included Gilles Lefèbvre, Alicia de Larrocha, Robert Mayer (who later founded Youth and Music in London on the model of the Jeunesses Musicales), Joan Miró, Pierre A. Pillet, Henryk Szeryng and Nicanor Zabaleta, in addition to the Jeunesses Musicales of France, Belgium and Canada. The movement grew rapidly; its first music camp was at Orford in Canada in 1951 and the first transatlantic exchanges of young musicians were in 1953, followed in 1956 by the first of an annual series of summer courses at Schloss Weikersheim in the German Federal Republic. In 1960 an international chorus was founded and an international competition for young pianists was organized; in 1969 a FIJM International Centre was established at Grozjan, a village in Yugoslavia, and in the same year the World Orchestra of the FIJM was formed with financial aid from the Canadian government. This orchestra meets annually and consists of graduate music students from many countries playing under leading conductors. The World Youth Choir was created in 1990 and meets each summer, performing both mainstream and contemporary repertory. The FIJM also embraces traditional music, rock music and jazz, organizes festivals and competitions and arranges international tours for gifted young musicians. In 1999 it encompassed 41 countries and 500,000 members.

Jeu-parti (Fr.; Provençal joc partit, partimen). A debate or dialogue in the form of a poem. According to Guilhem Molinier, the author of Las leys d'amors, a 13th-century treatise on how to write poetry in the style of the troubadours, there is a clear difference between a partimen and a tenso: in a partimen the first speaker presents a problem with two possible solutions, leaving his opponent the choice of which solution to defend while taking it upon himself to defend the opposite side; thus, the participants each defend a theory not out of conviction but for the sake of discussion. The theorist admitted that the two terms were often used the wrong way.

Not only did the troubadours and trouvères not use the two terms as described, they also did not distinguish between the two genres. It is thus better to examine jeux-partis as they are grouped together in those troubadour and trouvère sources that present the poems by genre. A jeu-parti is a debate or discussion, usually between two authors who contribute alternate strophes. In some poems the debate is as described in Las leys d'amors. In others the discussion is in a question and answer form, or the first speaker presents his own opinion, immediately challenging his opponent to take a different point of view.

Jeux-partis deal with a variety of topics, but that of love, especially courtly love, occurs frequently. In most debates the opponents are addressed by name, many being well-known troubadours or trouvères; in other instances the poet introduces two apparently imaginary debaters, or initiates a debate between himself and an imaginary opponent. Each opponent usually contributes three stanzas and an envoi in which he appeals to someone to be his judge; in some poems the two participants appeal to the same person, but more often than not each participant chooses his own judge.

Some 200 Old French jeux-partis survive, about half of them with music. Their musical style is indistinguishable from that of trouvère songs in general; and since all of them are strophic, the music does not reflect the form of the debate.

Jewett, Randolph [Juet, Randall] (b ?Chester, *c*1603; d Winchester, 3 July 1675). English organist and composer. According to 'A Fragment of the Visitation of the City of Chester in the year 1591, by Thomas Chaloner of Chester, Deputy to the Office of Arms', the Jewetts were a long-established Chester family of some eminence. William Jewett had been mayor in 1578, and was 'one of the Queenes Ma[jes]tes Chappell; reputed for an excellent synging man in his youthe, a martchant of great adventures, and a lover of gentlemanlye disports and exercises'. His eldest son, Randle, was a 'Merchant', and 'a singer in the King's Chappell', and he was a member of the Chester Cathedral choir from at least 1612–15. His youngest son was Randolph, who from about 1630 until 1638 was organist of both St Patrick's and Christ Church cathedrals, Dublin. Benjamin Rogers succeeded him at Christ Church in 1639, but he remained at St Patrick's until 1643 when he became organist of Chester Cathedral. In September 1642, Charles I visited Chester, and a payment of 20s. was made 'to Mr Jewet for his service in ye Quire'. In 1644 or 1645 he returned to Dublin, and was appointed vicar-choral of Christ Church – in succession to Rogers – on the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant, Lord Ormonde. Shortly afterwards he must also have joined the choir of St Paul's Cathedral in London, for he is named as a member of the then-suppressed establishment in 1649. In 1651 John Playford listed him in his Musicall Banquet as one of the many organists who were then available in the city for private teaching. In 1660 he was appointed almoner, and a year later Junior Cardinal of St Paul's. From 1666 until his death he was organist, master of the choristers and lay vicar of Winchester Cathedral. His memorial tablet is in the north transept of the cathedral.

According to Hawkins, Jewett was a pupil of Orlando Gibbons. If so, this would explain his fondness for complex vocal and instrumental sonorities, for Gibbons himself wrote many consort anthems of considerable proportions. Certainly the Bishop of Kilmore and Ardagh, William Bedell, thought the music at Christ Church to be excessively elaborate; services there, he said, 'were celebrated with all manner of instrumental musick, as organs, sackbutts, cornetts, violls, etc., as if it had been at the dedication of Nebuchadnezzar's golden image in the plain of Dura'.

Jewish music. This article concerns the traditional liturgical and non-liturgical music of the various Jewish communities worldwide, the contribution of Jewish performers and composers within their surrounding non-Jewish societies, and the musical culture of ancient Israel-/Palestine. For a discussion of music in the modern state of Israel, see ISRAEL.

Three Hebrew transliteration systems are employed throughout: one for the main body of the text and the bibliography; and two sub-systems to represent the distinctive pronunciations of the Jews of Yemen and Iraq. When musical examples have been reprinted from secondary sources the original transliteration has been preserved.

I. Introduction

1. Definitions and scope. 2. The study of Jewish music. 3. Sources. 4. Music in Jewish thought.

1. DEFINITIONS AND SCOPE. 'Jewish music' as a concept emerged among Jewish scholars and musicians only in the mid-19th century with the rise of modern national consciousness among European Jews, and since then all attempts to define it have faced many difficulties. The term 'Jewish music' in its nation-oriented sense was first coined by German or German-trained Jewish scholars, among whom the most influential in this respect was A.Z. Idelsohn (1882–1938), whose book Jewish Music in its Historical Development (1929/R) was a landmark in its field that is still widely consulted today. Idelsohn was the first scholar to incorporate the Jewish 'Orient' into his research, and thus his work presents the first ecumenical, though still fragmentary, description of the variety of surviving Jewish musical cultures set within a single historical narrative. In his work Idelsohn pursued a particular ideological agenda: he adopted the idea of the underlying cultural unity of the Jewish people despite their millenary dispersion among the nations, and promoted the view that the music of the various Jewish communities in the present expresses aspects of that unity. Moreover, Idelsohn's work implied a unilinear history of Jewish music dating back to the Temple in biblical Jerusalem. This approach was perpetuated in later attempts to write a comprehensive overview of Jewish music from a historical perspective (e.g. Avenary, 1971–2/R).

Despite its problematic nature, the concept of 'Jewish music' in its Idelsohnian sense is a figure of speech widely employed today, being used in many different contexts of musical activity: recorded popular music, art music composition, printed anthologies, scholarly research and so on. The use of this term to refer both to the traditional music of all Jewish communities, past and present, and to new contemporary music created by Jews with ethnic or national agendas is thus convenient, as long as its historical background and ideological connotations are borne in mind.

Since the beginning of the Jewish exile two thousand years ago, following the destruction of the Second Temple in Jerusalem in 70 CE, the Hebrew faith of biblical times, stemming from its east Mediterranean cradle and perpetuated and interpreted by the rabbis, has flourished in many corners of the world. 'Jewish music' as performed and studied in the present is almost wholly the product of life in exile. Information about the music of Jews in pre-exilic times is meagre. It consists mainly of references to musical activities in biblical and talmudic (Oral Law) texts, particularly the lavish musical pageantry of the Second Temple rituals in Jerusalem – a focus of interest among scholars of later periods. Archaeological findings and iconographical evidence also provide important data about the ancient music of Israel/Palestine (see §II below).

In exile, Jewish ethnicity became inextricably linked to two fundamental elements: observance of halakhah (religious law according to rabbinical interpretation) and historical memory (ritually perpetuated in the liturgy). Emerging in a community bonded by religious faith and rabbinical authority, the music of the Jews in exile developed within the context of the performative practices of religion. At the same time its contents, uses and functions were regulated by rabbinical sanctions.

The long path of exile (Heb. galut) also imposed on the Jews the need to accommodate to the hosting non-Jewish societies. Therefore, each community engaged in a musical dialogue with its non-Jewish surroundings, and through time many different Jewish 'musics' emerged. Moreover, frequent displacements and discontinuities affecting individual Jewish communities exercised a major influence on the musical culture of each group. All in all, the active participation of Jews in the musical traditions of the surrounding societies poses a challenging scholarly question: where exactly are the limits between the music 'made by Jews, for Jews, as Jews' (to quote the legendary definition of Jewish music proposed by Curt Sachs in his address to the First World Congress of Jewish Music in Paris, 1957) and the music 'made by Jews, as musicians, for all listeners'. A further question arises with music created by non-Jews but used by Jews within their own communities.

What is known as 'Jewish music' today is thus the result of complex historical processes. Being primarily an oral tradition, the lack of historical documentation about the music of Jewish communities, even in the recent past, poses major methodological challenges to research. The information available is of recent origin, and this data is certainly influenced by the profound social changes that have affected the Jews over the past two centuries, first in Europe and more latterly throughout the Islamic lands. One such process is the challenge to religious orthodoxy (either by mystical trends or by the various reformist movements); a second was the embracing of the secular nation-state concept by the Zionist movement. Against this background, any reconstruction of an authentic national music dating back to the period of mythical, 'normal' nationhood in biblical times on the basis of 20th-century data collected from the wide variety of contemporary Jewish communities is a futile undertaking. It is therefore necessary to consider the particularities of each of the many Jewish 'musics', both in the past and in the present, in their own terms. At the same time, it must be recognized that there are indeed features shared by the musical cultures of many Jewish communities. But rather than an expression of ancient nationhood, this shared heritage results from the common observance of religious law, the contacts between different communities in relatively recent times, the migration of musicians (especially synagogue cantors) from one community to another and the historical memory that has maintained a remarkable sense of Jewish identity in spite of exile and dispersal.

The scope of this article reflects the complexities of the concept of 'Jewish music' discussed above. It attempts to describe the uniqueness of each Jewish musical tradition according to the geographical distribution of the Jewish communities roughly from the 16th century until World War I. This distribution sets up the present-day boundaries between the Jewish ethnic groups on the basis of geographical and cultural identity. The main division is between Ashkenazi (originally from Germany and France, and who spread to eastern Europe after the 15th century), Sephardi (originally from the Iberian Peninsula, and who settled after 1492 in the Ottoman Empire, North Africa, and western Europe), 'Oriental' (Jews who remained in the Middle East or spread to the Arabian Peninsula, the Caucasus, Central Asia and India) and the Ethiopian Jews. The term 'Oriental' (Heb. 'edot ha-mizraḥ) was coined by Jewish Israeli sociologists to describe all eastern Jewish communities that were not wholly influenced by Sephardi Jews who fled from Spain and settled in the eastern Mediterranean. In the present-day Israeli context, however, 'Sephardi' has obliterated the less politically-correct 'Oriental', even though the latter term still persists in Jewish and Israeli musical literature. The Ethiopian Jews are treated here as a self-contained community because of their unique liturgical order and musical traditions that have no parallel in any other Jewish community.

This rough compartmentalization has been partially perpetuated in the new lands where Jews settled after the events that so profoundly affected them in the first half of the 20th century (the fall of the Austro-Hungarian, Tsarist Russian and Ottoman Empires, the rise of Zionism, and the Holocaust). Jews migrated to all countries that offered them shelter and these waves of emigration created the map of present-day Jewry. Today Jews are distributed between Israel, the Americas, western Europe, South Africa and Australia, to which may be added the sizeable Jewish community that remained in the former Soviet Union after World War II. Some emigrants escaping from Europe reached as far as China and Japan.

The emigration patterns led to new perceptions of Jewish ethnic identity. For example, Jews from the 'Oriental' communities – especially those in Israel – identify themselves as 'Sephardi' (partially on the basis of their acceptance of Sephardi rabbinical authority), Iraqi Jews who settled in Calcutta and Bombay in the 19th century identify themselves as 'Indian', and North African Jews who recently emigrated to France now consider themselves as 'French'. With the passing of time, these new identities (and thus new 'Jewish musics') replace the older ones. Despite the vital persistence of the basic Ashkenazi–Sephardi/Oriental paradigm, today many Jews tend to refer to themselves and their musical cultures more as American-, Russian-, British- or French Jewish, or as Israeli.

In addition to all Jewish ethnic groups, two other sects, the Samaritans and the Karaites, share with Judaism the acceptance of the Torah (Pentateuch) as divine revelation and as the source of religious practice. This article includes the music of the Karaite Jews who split from Judaism in the 8th century CE but who are conceptually closer to mainstream 'Rabbanite' Judaism than the Samaritans. For the music of the Samaritans, who split from Judaism in the 8th century BCE, see SAMARITAN MUSIC.

Music in religious settings predominates throughout this entry because of the crucial role of religion in exilic Jewish culture. The division between liturgical, paraliturgical (both §III) and non-liturgical music (§IV) denotes different contexts of creativity and performance within a traditional Jewish community. While the first two categories represent the inner core of the Jewish musical culture, the third, which includes Jewish folksongs and instrumental music, is the main area of contact between traditional Jewish music and surrounding, non-Jewish music cultures.

Religious music in Judaism is bounded by religious law (halakhah). Two crucial restrictions imposed by this law are the ban on the use of musical instruments in the synagogue (more lenient approaches apply this limitation only to Sabbaths and all Holy Days) and the prohibition against men listening to the voice of a woman. The first ban, whose most widely quoted rationale is that of a sign of mourning for the destruction of Temple in Jerusalem (although alternative explanations are equally feasible), led to the predominance of vocal music in traditional Jewish contexts. The only exception to this ban is the use of the shofar (ram's horn) in the liturgy of the High Holy Days (Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur), but not when it coincides with the Sabbath. The second, though not universally enforced, led to sexual segregation in religious musical performances. The repertories of Jewish men and women have generally different musical styles and languages (using Hebrew for men and vernacular Jewish languages for women) and are performed in different social contexts (liturgical and paraliturgical occasions in the synagogue among men; accompanying domestic chores and celebrating events of the life cycle among women). However, this dichotomy based on gender should not be over-emphasized. Men and women were not mutually excluded from each other's contexts of performance, as is shown, for example, in the use of melodies from the women's repertory for the singing of Hebrew religious songs by men.

The Emancipation of the Jews in Europe (beginning in the second half of the 18th century in Germany) led to the contestation of the very foundations of traditional Judaism. Following the spread of rationalism and the emergence of modern nation-states (especially after the French Revolution), Jews began to read their canonic religious texts in a scientific, critical way, to adopt and imitate patterns of behaviour from the non-Jewish 'civilized' society, and to expose themselves to the contemporary arts and literature. New types of Jews emerged from this process: the non-observant (called 'secular') and the liberal (i.e. Jews proposing non-Orthodox forms of Jewish religiosity, such as the Reform, the Conservative and the Reconstructionist Jews). The challenge to orthodoxy had profound musical consequences, as the synagogues of liberal movements became arenas for unprecedented musical creativity within Jewish religious contexts. As the traditional bans on musical instruments and sexual segregation were relaxed or completely abandoned, instruments, mixed choirs and women cantors became customary.

Moving away from the religious frameworks, the distinct identity of the Jewish musician within a wider socio-cultural unit becomes problematic (see below, §V). As secularism and modernization made their inroads into Jewish communities and as the integration of the Jew as a citizen in modern nation-states became more feasible, a paradox emerged. As music developed as an art for its own sake in Western culture during the 19th century, European Jews were granted, for the first time, access to its composition and professional performance. However, the full entry of a Jew into art music in Europe demanded, in general, a high price: the dissolution of his or her Jewish identity.

It is only since the Emancipation (with the exceptional case of Italy since the 17th century) that the phenomenon of Jewish composers overtly expressing themselves as Jews within the Western art music tradition has emerged. This process occurs in contemporary societies in which the Jewish community is integrated within the nation both as a religious and as a cultural entity, the most obvious contemporary example being the USA. This article addresses the possible reflections of the Jewish self in the work of outstanding Western composers of Jewish ancestry, the responses of audience (Jewish and non-Jewish) to such reflections and the approaches of recent scholarship to this modern phenomenon. The case of the State of Israel is different; with the emergence of the Jewish nation-state in the 20th century a particular new musical culture has developed (see ISRAEL), although the question of Jewish identity in music is nevertheless present there too. This entry also considers the involvement of Jews in the music of societies in which the social difference of the Jew was clearly demarcated. Such was the case in most Islamic countries, where Jews were able to participate in diverse spheres of musical creativity while remaining, due to the nature of the surrounding social order, within the confines of their religious community.

2. THE STUDY OF JEWISH MUSIC. Interest in the music of the Jews (or 'Hebrews' as they were commonly called) formed part of scholarly inquiries into the music of the 'peoples of antiquity' (next to the ancient Egyptians, the Greeks and the Romans) by early music historiographers (e.g. Padre G.B. Martini, Charles Burney, J.N. Forkel). The subject most frequently addressed was the speculation about the music of the Temple in Jerusalem, an interest that survived well into the 19th century. Another focus of attention was the Jewish cantillation of the Bible, a subject discussed by Renaissance Hebraists such as Johannes Reuchlin and music theorists such as Zarlino since the early 16th century (see Harrán, 1988).

Contemporary Jews and their music are rarely mentioned in music historiography before the mid-19th century (e.g. 'Hebrew Music of the Present Day' in Carl Engel's The Music of the Most Ancient Nations, London, 1864/R). The few early references to Jewish music usually originate in travellers' accounts or in anti-Semitic literature. They generally refer to the 'unpleasant' sound of synagogue services, to the exotic features of Jewish musical performance and to the relationship between the music of the Jews and that of the surrounding cultures.

The modern, systematic study of music in Jewish communities is intimately linked to the emergence of Wissenschaft des Judenthums in Germany in the early 19th century. This school of Jewish scholars sought to study Judaism and its sacred texts with the critical tools of scientific inquiry, such as philology and comparative literature. The most illustrious representative of this school in the field of music was Eduard Birnbaum (1855–1920). He systematically collected written sources on Jewish music available in his time (manuscript and printed scores as well as literary evidence), toured communities in Europe seeking materials in libraries and private estates, and published many essays on different aspects, periods and traditions of Jewish music (see Seroussi, 1982).

Precedents of Birnbaum's research can be found in introductions to printed collections of Jewish liturgical music and in bulletins of the synagogue cantors' associations, which began to proliferate in Germany and the Austro-Hungarian Empire after 1840 (e.g. Die jüdische Kantor, Bromberg, 1879–98). Another example of this type of early study is the detailed essay on the music of the Sephardi liturgy by Reverend David Aharon de Sola, cantor of the Spanish-Portuguese Synagogue in London, printed in The Ancient Melodies of the Liturgy of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews (London, 1857); ex.1 – a traditional Sephardi melody – shows the early style of notation, with keyboard accompaniment, used in this work. Two other important landmarks of late 19th-century Jewish music scholarship are Joseph Singer's study of the musical modes (Yiddish shteyger) of the Ashkenazi liturgy (1886) and Abraham Baer's comprehensive collection of Ashkenazi liturgical music (1887/R).

The philological approach of Birnbaum and his contemporaries in Germany, with its focus on written documents, did not address the problems arising from the essentially oral nature of Jewish music. Moreover, the musical traditions of the 'other' Jews (i.e. the non-Europeans) were still terra incognita. This vacuum was filled by A.Z. Idelsohn, who embarked on the study of the 'missing links' of Jewish music history. After he moved to Palestine in 1907, he discovered the wealth of Sephardi and Oriental Jewish traditions and engaged in their recording, transcription, analysis and comparative study (e.g. his pioneering study of the Arabic maqāmāt in the Sephardi liturgy) with the support of the Phonograph Archiv in Vienna. Idelsohn published the results of his field inquiries in Palestine in the first five volumes of his Hebräisch-orientalischer Melodienschatz (1914–32/R; henceforth referred to as HoM); the remaining five volumes, documenting the Ashkenazi traditions, were compiled after Idelsohn left Palestine for the USA in 1921. In his numerous other publications, Idelsohn treated a vast array of subjects, inspiring many modern research trends in this field (Schleifer, 1986).

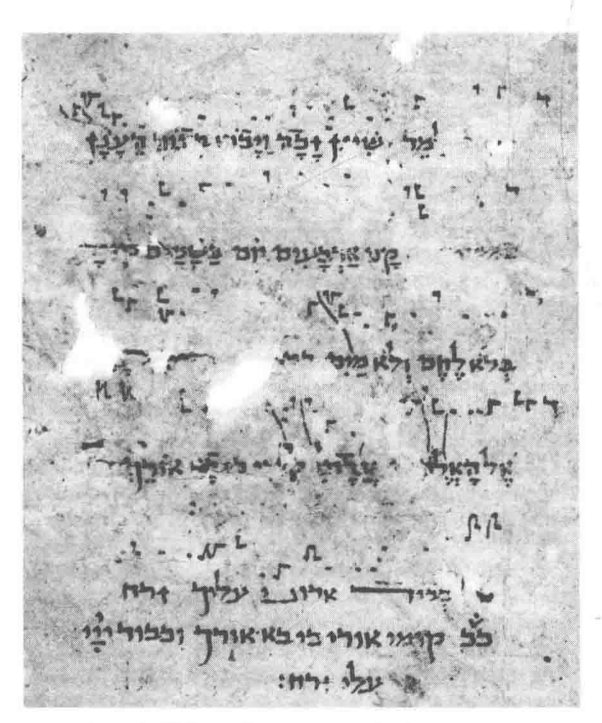
Idelsohn was by no means the only scholar addressing Jewish oral traditions. Robert Lachmann (1892–1939), a leader of the Berlin school of comparative musicology, contributed a paradigmatic study with his monograph on the music of the Jews of the Island of Djerba, Tunisia (1940; repr. in the original Ger. with musical transcriptions, 1978). This was the first encompassing musical ethnography of a single Jewish community. After his emigration to Palestine in 1935, Lachmann founded the Archive of Oriental Jewish Music at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where he continued to document Jewish traditions. The comparativist school continued in Palestine with the work of Lachmann's disciple and assistant, Edith Gerson-Kiwi (1908–92).

Other major projects of documentation and publication of oral traditions were carried out in Russia and later in the Soviet Union. The Jewish Folk Music Society was active in several cities between 1908 and 1918 under the leadership of Joel Engel (1868–1927), and the Jewish Historical-Ethnographical Society, established in 1908 and directed by the folklorist S. An-Ski (1863–1920), carried out extensive research into folk music, in addition to the promotion of a national school of art music based on Jewish musical themes (see §IV, 2(iii)(b) below). The 'ethnographic expeditions' directed by An-Ski between 1911 and 1914 were particularly remarkable. After the final dissolution of the Jewish Historical-Ethnographical Society in 1929, its collection of recorded cylinders, as well as those of Engel and Sussman Kisselhof from Leningrad, were incorporated into the Cabinet of Music Ethnography of the Ethnographic Section of the Institute for Jewish Culture in Kiev (functioned 1928–49). The founder and director of the Cabinet, Moisey Beregovsky (1892–1961) pursued a particular ideological and methodological agenda (Slobin, 1982). Working within the Stalinist Soviet Union, Beregovsky applied a Marxist approach to the study of Ashkenazi folk music, thus rejecting Idelsohn's national ideology. The important collections of the Cabinet, considered lost after World War II, were rediscovered in the mid-1990s at the Vernadsky Central Scientific Library in Kiev (see Adler, 'A la recherche de chants perdus', 1995).

Other important projects of collection and study of oral sources were carried out by individual musicologists. The interest in the Judeo-Spanish folksong among non-Jewish Spanish scholars, particularly Ramón Menéndez Pidal, promoted the fieldwork project of Manuel Manrique de Lara on behalf of the Centro de Estudios Históricos in Madrid (1912; 1915). Further studies by the Spaniards Manuel Ortega and Arcadio de Larrea Palacín laid the foundations for scholarship in this field in Spain. The Turkish-born Jewish composer and ethnographer Alberto Hemsi (1892–1975) also recorded an impressive collection of Judeo-Spanish folksongs in the eastern Mediterranean (see Seroussi and others, 1995).

Another major ethnographic work was undertaken in Italy by Leo Levi (1912–82) on behalf of the Centro Nazionale di Studi di Musica Populare in Rome. Levi's collection, now located at the Discoteca di Stato and at the Accademia di Santa Cecilia in Rome, as well as at the National Sound Archives in Jerusalem, is crucial for the study of many Italian Jewish musical traditions that have since disappeared.



The growing interest in Jewish oral traditions did not hinder historical studies based on written documentation. Eric Werner (1901–88) produced philological studies of writings on music in medieval Judeo-Arabic sources, and comparative studies of the Jewish and early Christian liturgy (1959–84), and of the Ashkenazi tradition (A Voice Still Heard, 1976). Israel Adler rediscovered and studied the Hebrew compositions of European art music from the 17th and 18th centuries, challenging established views concerning the nature of Jewish musical creativity and absorption of Western art music prior to the Emancipation (Adler, 1966). A synthesis between the study of oral traditions and of written sources is found in several groundbreaking studies by Hanoch Avenary (1908–94). Bathja Bayer (1928–95) developed the new field of Jewish archaeomusicology and iconography, shedding new light on the music of ancient Israel.

Since the 1970s the study of Jewish music from modern ethnomusicological perspectives has flourished in Israel, the USA and more recently in western Europe. The Jewish Music Research Centre (founded by Adler in 1965) at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem provides the institutional framework for such study in Israel. In the USA, research is carried out in major universities by individual researchers, as well as in Jewish institutions of higher learning, such as the Hebrew Union College (HUC), the Jewish Theological Seminary of America (JTS), Yeshiva University and the Yidisher visenshaftlikher institut (YIVO).

3. SOURCES. The major resources for the study of Jewish music are the oral traditions of the various communities worldwide. These have been documented only from the beginning of the 20th century, at first sporadically but later more systematically. Written sources relating to Jewish music are mainly of a literary nature. The primary sources – such as the Bible, the Oral Law (Mishnah and Talmud), Midrash (biblical hermeneutics), mystical treatises and rabbinical writings, particularly responsa – provide information about the uses, functions and character of Jewish music during its formative period, as well as the attitudes of religious authorities towards it (see §4 below). These sources are supplemented by secondary, circumstantial evidence such as travellers' diaries. The substantial use of Western musical notation in Jewish music, especially in print, is a later development (after *c*1840) and was generally employed for the perpetuation of new compositions rather than the preservation or recording of oral traditions.

Among the rare and sporadic notations of traditional Jewish music prior to 1840 are a 12th-century, single-leaf manuscript (notated in Beneventan neumes) by Obadiah the Norman Proselyte found in the Cairo Genizah (fig.1), the notations of musical motifs of the Masoretic accents by Hebraists, such as Johannes Reuchlin's De accentibus et orthographia linguae hebraicae (Hagenau, 1518; see §III, 3, fig.15 below), the specimens notated by early musical historiographers (and subsequently reproduced until the 19th century), such as Anastasius Kircher's Musurgia universalis (Rome, 1650), and the documentation by composers interested in 'ancient Hebrew music' as a source of inspiration, such as Benedetto Marcello's Estro poetico-armonico (Venice, 1724–7). From the mid-18th century onwards, a few cantors in Germany began to document their new tunes in manuscript, ushering in the era of musical notation in European Jewish music (Adler, 1989). Notations of traditional Jewish music from the Middle Eastern communities date from a much later period, for example the specimens included in the scientific reports from Syria by Dom Jean Parisot (1899; 1903).

The major collections of Jewish music documentation, either oral or written, are associated with prominent scholars in the field. The Birnbaum Collection of Jewish music at the Klau Library of the HUC in Cincinnati is the largest repository of manuscripts and documents of Jewish music. The collection covers Jewish musical life in Europe, with special emphasis on Germany, during the 19th and early 20th centuries. Other major repositories of scores and written documents are the Eric Mandell Collection (Gratz College, Philadelphia), the funds of the JTS (New York) and the Jacob Michael Collection (Jewish National and University Library – JNUL – in Jerusalem). The Music Department of JNUL includes the vast Noy-Wachs collection of Yiddish and Hebrew songs (over 15,000 items), as well as the estates of many Jewish composers, scholars (including the Idelsohn Collection) and institutions (e.g. the short-lived World Center for Jewish Music; see Bohlman, 1992).

The National Sound Archives, located at JNUL, houses the largest repository of field recordings of Jewish music in the world. It incorporates the historical recordings of Idelsohn, Lachmann, Edith Gerson-Kiwi, Leo Levi, Johanna Spector and those of the younger generations of Israeli scholars. Renanot, the Institute of Jewish Music in Jerusalem (formerly Institute of Religious Music), also possesses a sizeable collection of recordings. Important assemblages of recorded Jewish music outside Israel include the Phonograph Archiv in Vienna and the private collections of American researchers, such as the Samuel Armistead, Israel Katz and Joseph Silverman Collection of Judeo-Spanish Songs, the Kay Kaufman Shelemay Collection of Ethiopian and Syrian Jewish Music, and various assemblages of klezmer and Ashkenazi liturgical music by Mark Slobin, Walter Zev Feldman, Andy Statman, Hankus Netsky, Judit Frigyesi and others. The Milken Archive of American Jewish Music is a new project dedicated to the preservation of previously unrecorded traditional and newly composed Jewish music from the USA. Another important source of sound recordings that can contribute substantially to research are the early 78 r.p.m records. This is an area, however, in which substantial research and cataloguing is still required.

Basic bibliographical tools are Sendrey (1951/R) followed by Weisser (1969), Heskes (1985; incl. a comprehensive bibliography of bibliographies), Seroussi (1993) and Adler (The Study of Jewish Music, 1995). (Updates are found in the journal Musica judaica.) The systematic compilation of texts concerning Jewish music and scores was initiated by Birnbaum and Idelsohn and continued with the work of Avenary. Catalogues of Hebrew writings concerning music and of notated sources of Jewish music up to 1840 have been published by Adler in RISM (1975; 1989), providing a fundamental resource for the study of Jewish music history. Shlomo Hofman contributed compilations of passages about music and musical instruments in the Bible (1965, 2/1974) and in the Mishnah and the Talmud (1989), while Shiloah and Tenne (1977) have done the same for the major work of Jewish mysticism, the Sefer ha-zohar (Book of Splendour).

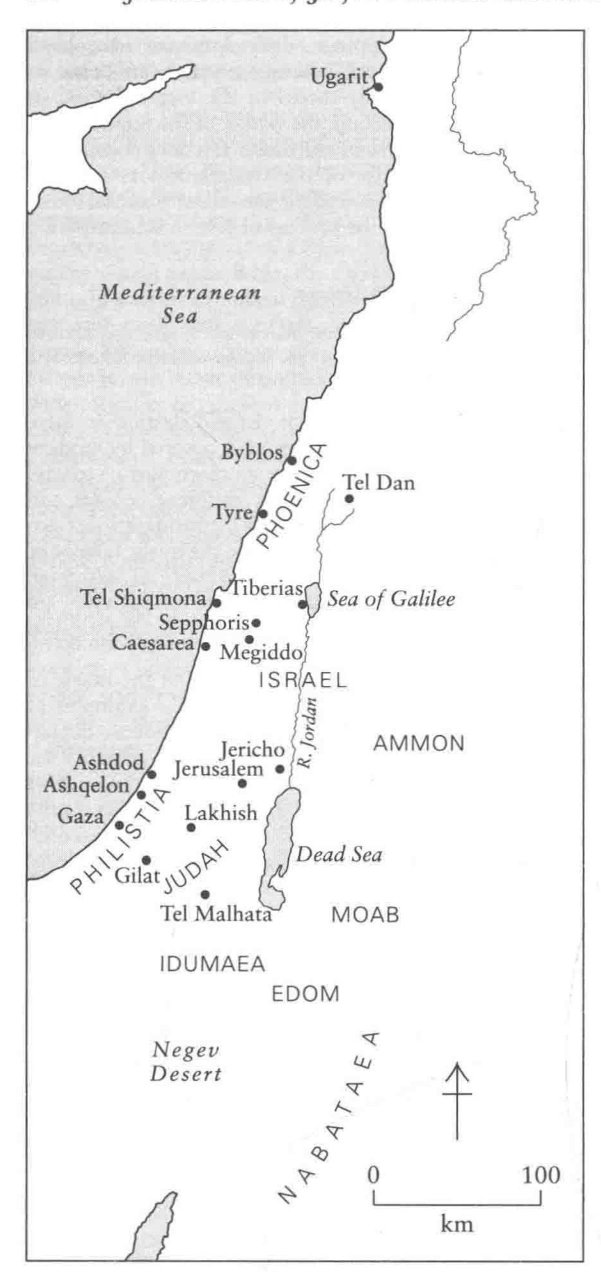
4. MUSIC IN JEWISH THOUGHT. In addition to the Jewish musical repertories discussed in this entry, a considerable body of writings about music emerged within traditional Judaism. The contents and natures of these writings vary considerably, for example talmudic arguments, biblical hermeneutics, rabbinical responsa and mystical treatises. The dates of their composition range from the talmudic (2nd to 5th centuries CE) and geonic periods (6th to 11th centuries) to the Middle Ages and the modern era, and they were written in by authors living in the Christian and Islamic worlds. Some writings include legislative rulings on musical matters, and the ethics and aesthetics of music. Others reflect the impact of philosophy and secular education on medieval Jews, such as the ḥokhmat ha-musiqah ('theory of music'), which was part of the quadrivium in the Christian universities.

Legislative rulings concern the desirable manner of performance, the necessary qualities of the performers and the content of music in traditional Jewish society. Two key legislatures have been mentioned above: the rejection of the female voice, based on Rav's dictum that 'the voice of a woman is indecent' (Babylonian Talmud, Berakhot 24a); and the ban on instrumental music (Babylonian Talmud, Soṭah 48a etc.). Rabbinical opinions on music content and performance, however, do not present a unified position. For example, the talmudic statement that the duty to 'gladden the groom and bride' with music (Babylonian Talmud, Berakhot 6b) softens the predominant opposition to all forms of instrumental music. This ambivalence towards music is also found in the influential writings by the Spanish rabbi Maimonides (1135–1204). In his famous responsum on the performance of Arabic songs with instrumental accompaniment (probably addressed to the Jewish community of Aleppo; Cohen, 1935) Maimonides synthesized previous rabbinical opinions and presented a harsh position against all music not totally at the service of religious worship. On the other hand, writing as a physician, he recommended listening to instrumental music for its healing powers. The lineage of the commentaries and rulings on these and other musical subjects, particularly the perennial issue of the use of melodies from the surrounding cultures in the synagogue, has continued until the present day. One of the latest statements on this issue is a responsum published in 1954 by Rabbi Obadiah Yossef, former chief Sephardi rabbi of Israel, favouring the use of melodies of Arabic songs in the synagogue.

Jewish mystical treatises, particularly since the 13th century, deal with the ethical, magical and theurgic powers of music (Idel, 1997). These powers enhance the religious experience of the mystic. For example, the unravelling, through singing and concentration, of the concealed 'intentions' (kavvanot) of the regular prayers (e.g. by expanding key words with melody) may accelerate the union between man and his creator or between the world and its creator.

The variety of Jewish writings about music and of the positions expressed in them proves that there is no unified ideology of music in Judaism. Two main ideas, however, appear to dominate many traditional writings about music. First, the original purpose of music in religious life is the authentic expression of human feelings by each individual. This approach disregards the idea of a transcendental musical beauty, whether an echo or imitation of a heavenly model or the inspiration of an individual genius. Second, the power of the human voice overrules that of instrumental music. It is not a coincidence that the beautification of the synagogue services with music 'for its own sake' and the use of instrumental music are the hallmarks of the process of Jewish Emancipation in the modern era.



II. Ancient Israel/Palestine

1. INTRODUCTION. Ancient Israel/Palestine is here defined as roughly the territory now covered by modern Israel, Jordan, Lebanon and the southern part of coastal Syria (fig.2). Inhabited by many different peoples and cultures throughout the period under consideration, from the Neolithic era until Roman times, the music history of the region shows a great diversity of traditions. Although the strong influences of EGYPT and MESOPOTAMIA are evident, so, too, is the development of a distinct musical culture particular to the area.

The major source of information about the music of ancient Israel/Palestine is archaeological – examples of musical instruments and iconographical evidence depicting musical scenes. However, literary texts (notably the Old Testament and the writings of such Roman authors as Josephus) also shed some light on to the subject for the later period in particular. The Bible contains a substantial number of references to various kinds of musical instruments, many of which have been identified with surviving examples, and often provides valuable information on the social and religious contexts in which they were performed; for further discussion of the individual instruments, see BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS. (The abbreviation IAA is used for the Israel Antiquities Authority.)

2. THE CANAANITE INHERITANCE. The earliest known evidence of acoustical activity in ancient Israel/Palestine are archaeological finds dating from the time of the Neolithic Revolution (Natufian culture and Early Neolithic period, 12th–8th millennia BCE) – stringed rattles and bullroarers, which served as adornments, cult objects, and tools as well as sound-producing instruments (Braun, 'Musical Instruments', 1997, fig.1). Only in the 4th millennium BCE, with the Early Bronze Age, did a change (that can be defined as an Acoustical-Organological Revolution) occur and a new generation of musical instruments appear, including the hourglass drum and the triangular frame harp (Braun, 1999, Abb.II/2).

The musical tradition of the people known as the Canaanites developed during the Bronze Age (*c*3500–1200 BCE) within a rapidly growing urban society. Although it flourished at the crossroads of the Egyptian and Mesopotamian cultures, it nevertheless evolved its own unique characteristics and itself exerted an influence on the musical practices of the wider area (Caubet, 1994; Braun, 1999, chap.iii). With the exception of a few surviving cuneiform texts from Ugarit (14th–13th centuries BCE; now Ras Shamra, Syria) concerning the musical instruments of the Levant (knr: 'lyre'; mṣltm: 'cymbals'; and tf: 'drum'; see Caubet, 1987), the source material for this period is entirely archaeological.

2. Map of Ancient Israel/Palestine

The range of instruments known in Canaan included all categories commonly used in the ancient Middle and Near East, although each type possessed a distinct character particular to the indigenous people of the region in its structure, function or manner of performance. It can be seen in the unique terracotta sculpture from Gilat of the late 4th millennium BCE (fig.3; Alon, 1976), which depicts a woman holding an hourglass drum under her arm, and a contemporary stone sketch from Megiddo of the triangular harp (Braun, forthcoming), the earliest-known document of its kind. The first-known unambiguous depiction of the lyre, called in the Near East by words deriving from the root knr – the kinnor of the Bible, is a wall painting from the Beni-Hasan tomb in Egypt (*c*1900 BCE; fig.4). The instrument is shown being played in a horizontal position by a Canaanite/Semitic musician as he walks. A different manner of performance is seen on an ivory plaque engraving from Megiddo (13th century BCE; see BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS, fig.3), the lyre being held under the arm in an attitude favouring solo virtuoso performance. A clay plaque from Tel Dan (15th century BCE) shows the lute played in a context combining popular forms of music, dance and theatre (Biran, 1986; Braun, MGG2, 'Biblische Musikinstrumente', Abb.3). The double reedpipe is depicted for the first time in the late Canaanite period (15th–14th centuries BCE) as a solo accompaniment for an erotic dance (ibid., Abb.4).

The small round frame drum (probably the biblical tof) appears in Canaan as early as the first centuries of the 2nd millennium BCE on a rock sketch in the Negev desert; it accompanies a men's round dance, a tradition that persisted in the Middle East for millennia, along with nude female dancers playing the lyre (fig.5; Anati, 1963). Some 20 pairs of bronze cymbals (probably the biblical meṣiltayim; see BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS, fig.6) from the 15th–11th centuries BCE have been found along the entire Levantine coast from Ashqelon to Ugarit. Other idiophones were also widely spread, especially primitive pottery rattles of a form particular to the region; such instruments (probably the biblical mena'ane'im) seem to have been the indigenous mass rhythm-instrument, with extant examples dating from the Early Bronze Age to the Babylonian/Persian period (see BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS, fig.5).

Specially trained musicians and singers performed sacred music for such Canaanite gods as Anat (e.g. Kerker, one of the singers who performed in honour of the Egyptian god Amun; see Loud, 1939, no.381). The local aristocracy was celebrated and entertained by professional performers, and educated young men and women in singing and instrumental music for this very purpose (Pritchard, 1950, no.487). Ugaritic texts mention singing (sr) – by both men and women – and music-making by and for Baal and other gods (Caubet, 1987, p.734; Seidel, 1989, p.37). Of especial importance is the unique cuneiform text of a Hurrian cult song from Ugarit; since its publication in 1970 it has been a focus of Assyriological-musicological discussion (Güterbock, 1970; Wulstan, 1971; Kilmer, 1974, and 1976; see also MESOPOTAMIA, fig.7). Duchesne-Guillemin (1984) proposed an interpretation of this text that suggests parallels in traditional Jewish psalmody and Syro-Chaldaean Christian chant.

The Canaanite instrumentarium and performance style suggest that the music was of a lively, sometimes orgiastic character, a hypothesis supported by the group of five musicians depicted on a pottery cult stand from Ashdod (fig.6; Dothan, 1970): two with double pipes and the others each with cymbals, drum and lyre. This type of ensemble, formerly known as the 'Phoenician Orchestra', may represent an early form of the Cybele cult and is recognized as part of a local musical tradition shared by the Canaanites, Philistines, Phoenicians and Judaeans. Cheironomy was also probably practised in Canaan; there are documentary records of its unbroken existence in Egypt from at least 2400 BCE onwards, it is mentioned in the Babylonian Talmud (Berakhot 62a) and still lives on today in several East African Jewish communities (see CHEIRONOMY, §4). While earlier, often obsolete traditions continued to exist in Bronze Age Canaan, the city cultures developed a rich musical tradition of a rather homogeneous and, for that time, particularly advanced style.

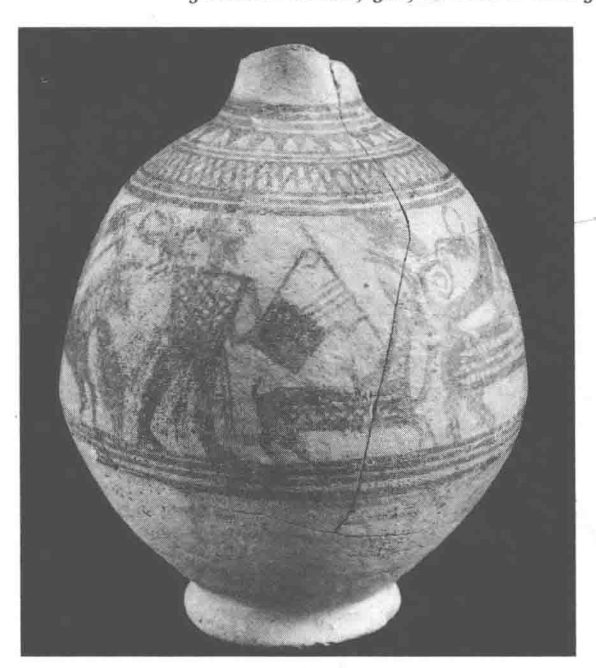
3. ISRAEL AND JUDAH IN THE IRON AGE (*c*1000–586 BCE). The late Bronze Age and early Iron Age saw significant changes in the social and political history of the region. Immigrant peoples began to settle the area and the Canaanite city-states gave way to the formation of other territorial units based on various ethnic and national identities (Weippert, 1988, p.352), a process that also led to the collapse of Canaanite urban culture. In particular, the 'Sea Peoples' (Phoenicians and Philistines) established their lands along the coast and the Israelite tribes united under the leadership of Saul (fl 1020–1010) and his successors David (fl 1010–961) and Solomon (*c*961–922) to form the kingdom of Israel. After the latter's death, however, the united kingdom was divided between Israel in the north and Judah to the south; both eventually fell to Assyrian/Babylonian expansion, Israel in 722/1 and Judah in 586, when the First Temple (built by Solomon) was destroyed and the Babylonian exile began.



Such social and political changes inevitably affected the cultural practices of the region. The musical tradition that emerged in Iron Age Israel/Palestine developed from a mixture of the Canaanite inheritance, the practices of the immigrant peoples and an extremely heterogeneous local cultural tradition that resulted from, and was shaped by, internal long-term socio-economic transformation (McGovern, 1987, p.270; Finkelstein, 1988, and 1995).

The musical culture of Canaan, like its mythology, 'both where the Old Testament incorporates it and where the Old Testament reacts against it . . . continues to exert its impact upon us through the Bible' (Gordon, 1961, p.215). Not only do the Ugaritic texts appear to be related to the later Old Testament writings (Caquot, 1974, pp.156, 162; Pardee, 1988, pp.80, 125), but there is also evidence of elements of the Canaanite musical tradition in the Old Testament. A comparison of two parallel verses (2 Samuel vi.5 and its later revised version 1 Chronicles xiii.8) confirms the existence of such continuity, but also shows that the old Canaanite tradition was later superseded. The first text mentions an ensemble playing loud orgiastic music, mainly on idiophones and membranophones – 'aṣei beroshim, kinnorot, nevalim, tupim, mena'ane'im and ṣelṣelim (see BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS, §3); the second, as a result of textual editing or changes in the musical ritual itself, lists a proper liturgical performance by shirim ('songs', from shr) and instrumentalists playing kinnorot, nebalim, tupim, meṣiltayim and ḥaṣoṣerot.

As with the Bronze Age, the primary sources of information for Israel/Palestine in the Iron Age are archaeological. Evidence exists for the long-term continuation of some musical traditions, as well as for distinct changes that occurred directly after the establishment of the united monarchy of Israel or during the period of the divided kingdom. Indeed, instruments of widespread and mass distribution such as pottery rattles (probably mena'ane'im) continued in use and were only completely replaced by iron bells (pa'amonim) in the Persian era some 500 years later (see BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS, fig.7). The drum (tof), like the rattle, was also widely used, and to some extent even became a fetish object (about 60 terracotta figures of women with a drum have been found all over the region and are dated to the 9th–6th centuries BCE; see BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS, fig.10). On the other hand, idiophones such as cymbals – the instrument of the more prosperous social classes – disappeared completely and only reappeared in the Hellenistic II/Early Roman period.

The lyre (fig.7) seems to have been used particularly by priests and remained the most frequently played instrument. Its form was gradually simplified – a development associated with the decrease in the number of strings and thus with a change in musical style (compare BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS, fig.3 from the 12th century BCE with fig.8 below showing Judaean lyres of the early 8th century BCE). The lute, for which, remarkably, no adequate name has been found in the Bible, disappeared entirely and did not return to use until Hellenistic times (Braun, 'The Lute and Organ', 1997). Likewise the harp was absent from musical life: the fact that after the single stone sketch of a harp from the late 4th millennium BCE no other evidence of this instrument has been discovered before the Hellenistic period should put an end to the legend of King David's Harp. The double reedpipe, however, continued to dominate musical life (see BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS, fig.1), and a new form of this instrument, a zurna-type aerophone with conical pipes, appeared for the first time around the 7th century BCE (fig.9; Beit-Arieh, 1996).

All the changes mentioned above indicate that during this period instrumental music and probably the musical style itself became simplified and restricted in many respects. This development that probably reflects the general impoverishment of the population on the one hand, and the cultural and religious seclusion policy of the Israelite theocracy on the other (Isaiah v.11–12 and xxiii.16; Amos vi.5–6). As before, in the Iron Age the local women musicians were highly esteemed throughout the Middle and Near East: Judaean female singers and lyre players were the most valuable tribute paid by King Hezekiah of Judah (*c*727–698 BCE) to the Assyrian King Sennacherib (*c*701 BCE; fig.8; Pritchard, 1955, p.487).

During the time of the divided kingdom the musical practices of the Philistines and Phoenicians were especially influential; in fact most of the archaeological evidence dating from this period stems from these cultures. Some 20 items of Philistine origin may be considered, among them the pottery stand from Ashdod mentioned above (see above, fig.6; see 1 Samuel x.5–6; Dothan, 1970) and the stand from Tel Qasila (IAA 74.449) depicting men performing a round dance – a tradition still preserved today in the dabkah-dance (Mazar, 1980, p.89). While the Philistine musical finds seem to be of an élitist type, those from Phoenicia have a mass-produced character (mainly terracotta figurines of female double-pipe and drum players; see BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS, fig.1 and fig.10).

The tiny Edomite Kingdom (8th–6th centuries BCE), which lay to the south-east of Judah, seems to have possessed a unique style in both the visual arts and music. Several terracotta figurines provide the best evidence of this little-studied, but important musical culture: one, probably of a deity, shows a typical Israelite rattle on top of the figurine's head (IAA 87.117); and another depicts a musician playing the double-zurna (fig.9) – a new instrument type for this era. The dispersal pattern of the musical instruments in the territory of Israel and Judah shows that, despite the growing artistic self-identification of the different national and ethnic peoples, the musical instrumentarium remained basically homogeneous, although the music itself probably varied from group to group.

While information on the nature and structure of the musical instruments of the Israelites is scarce, evidence concerning the social contexts of music-making is found in the Old Testament. The text describes the supernatural force of the sound of the shofar (Exodus xix.13, 16 and 19; Joshua vi.4–9), the therapeutic powers of the kinnor (1 Samuel xvi.16), the apotropaic and prophylactic functions of the pa'amonim (Exodus xxviii.33–4) and the use of music as a means of stimulating prophecy and ecstatic states (1 Samuel x.5; 2 Kings iii.15). It also speaks of the two silver trumpets that the Lord commanded

Moses to make in the desert (Numbers x.1–10). The role of music in the central rite of worship in the Temple – the burnt offering 'according to the commandment of David' during the reign of King Hezekiah (late 8th century BCE) – is described in particular detail (see esp. 2 Chronicles xxix.25–6). Surprisingly, this information is given only by later chroniclers (1 Chronicles xxiii.30–32 and 2 Chronicles xxix.20–30), and is absent from the books written before the Babylonian exile (2 Samuel xxiv.20–25 and 1 Kings viii.62–4).

According to the Old Testament, music was a customary feature of secular daily life, as for example at a farewell ceremony (Genesis xxxi.27), a procession during a holy war (2 Chronicles xx.28), an act of paraliturgical festive worship (Isaiah xxx.29) or in hymns (Isaiah xxv.1), as a song sung for the digging of a well (Numbers xxi.17–18), a lament for the dead (2 Samuel i.17–27), as a signal of communication (Isaiah xviii.3) and the attribute of drunkards, sinners and harlots (Isaiah v.11–12; xiv.11; xxiii.15–16). Singing and various song forms – such as those of thanksgiving and praise (Isaiah xii.5–6; xxxviii.9), the song and dance of victory performed by women (1 Samuel xviii.6–7), jubilation songs (Isaiah xxvi.1), glorification hymns, laments, and processional and grape-harvesting songs – were a significant part of musical life (cf also the Song of the Sea; Exodus xv.1–18). In one case a post-biblical text describes not only the performance of professional singing, but also mentions the name of the singer – Hugras ben Levi (Mishnah, Yoma iii.11).

In the present state of research, however, it remains difficult to draw any firm conclusions about the structure of the music itself. Some indirect indications may be deduced from the structure of biblical poetical texts, as, for instance, the refrain form (2 Samuel i.19, 25 and 27), or the principle of parallelismus membrorum (2 Samuel i.20). The latter, which consists of the repetition of a poetic idea twice or more times in varied forms within a single verse, may suggest parallel, slightly varied musical structures. In some passages evidence of antiphonal (1 Samuel xviii.6–7) or responsorial (Ezra iii.10–11) singing may also be detected. The main problem, however, with a historiographical interpretation of the Bible remains the striking apparent contradictions of text and archaeological evidence. For example, the Old Testament refers to the use of the ḥaṣoṣerah at the time of Moses (probably the first half of the 2nd millennium BCE; Numbers x.2) and at the coronation of King Joash (late 9th century BCE; 2 Kings xi.14), but no archaeological evidence has been found for the trumpet in the region of ancient Israel-/Palestine before the Hellenistic era (see below). Similarly, while the Bible describes cymbals as a central part of the musical liturgy at the Temple (Ezra iii.10; Nehemiah xii.27 etc.), no examples or depictions of such instruments have been discovered in the region that date from the Iron Age and Babylonian/Persian period (586–3rd century BCE).

4. THE PERSIAN AND HELLENISTIC/ROMAN PERIODS (586 BCE–70 CE). A particularly large discrepancy exists between the material facts, as derived from archaeological and documentary sources, and the biblical texts describing musical activities of the Babylonian/Persian period (up to the 3rd century BCE). The Old Testament paints a glowing picture of musical revival after the edict of Cyrus (538 BCE) and the building of the Second Temple (completed 515) under Darius I. The second chapter of Ezra (written 4th–3rd centuries BCE) describes the return from the Babylonian exile of 4289 priests (kohanim), 74 Levites (leviyim), 128 musicians and singers (meshorerim) and over 200 male and female singers (meshorerim and meshorerot) of lower status. Similar descriptions are found in Nehemiah vii. Glorious orchestras and choirs accompanied the building of the Temple and city walls (Ezra iii.10–11; Nehemiah xii.27, 35–6). The post-biblical Jewish literature (Mishnah, 'Arakhin ii.3 and 5; Sukkah v.4) projects backwards, adding details regarding the numbers of particular musical instruments in the Second Temple ensemble, possibly using the Babylonian court orchestra as a model for these descriptions (Avenary and Bayer, 1971–2, col.560).

It has been claimed, particularly on the basis of passages in Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah, that the evidence concerning the Temple music of this period is reliable and precise, and that it provides sufficient grounds for conclusions to be drawn concerning the style of the music, the numbers of instruments and the types of ensembles on which it was played (McKinnon, 1979–80; Werner, 1989; Seidel, 1989). The archaeological findings, however, present a very different picture. Excavations have so far produced few finds for this period, only one of which – a drawing of a female round-dance (MacAlister, 1912, iii, pls.177/6 and 10) – can be considered to have musical interest. A similar lack of musical information is apparent in the non-biblical literary sources (papyri from Elephantine and Samaria in Egypt). In the present state of research, therefore, the nature of the musical liturgy at the Temple during this period remains an open question and the possibility that the authors of the biblical texts may have glorified the past must be considered.

The evidence dating from the Hellenistic/Roman period (from the 3rd century BCE) is of a different nature. It corresponds to the general culture of Near Eastern Hellenism and the Roman periphery, which both gained from the Graeco-Roman metropolitan culture and enriched it, especially in the field of music. Sources confirm a break in the development of the musical tradition of ancient Israel/Palestine and the emergence of a rich syncretic musical culture. The active cultural exchange typical of this period, the establishment of a number of mini-states (e.g. Nabataea, Idumaea) and the development of socio-cultural entities (e.g. the Samaritans) within the territory of Israel/Palestine generated the introduction of new instruments, musical forms and styles (Braun, 1999, Abb. V/3, 5 and 6). Bells, rattles and cymbals became widely distributed, both in their old shapes and in new forms (e.g. as forked cymbals in both the Samaritan (Braun, 1999, Abb.V/6-10) and Dionysian cults (fig.10). Certain customs mentioned in the Old Testament and rooted in earlier Middle Eastern traditions, such as the fastening of little bells to the robes of priests, have been confirmed by archaeological evidence (Weiss and Netzer, 1996, p.20); the beating of bells in the form of castanets appears for the first time in Gaza (Hickmann, 'Cymbals et crotales', 1949). The use of the arghūl (a double clarinet with pipes of different lengths) is first attested in Nabataean culture (Braun, 1993).

The most important changes, however, occurred in the chordophones and aerophones. The lute was revived and became an overtly pagan instrument, particularly in the Dionysian cult (fig.11; Braun, 'The Lute and Organ',

10. Part of a mosaic floor depicting a Dionysian scene with a satyr holding forked cymbals ('crotala') and a dancer with bells; Sheich Zuwejid, Gaza, 1st–4th centuries CE (Ismailia Historical Museum)

1997); the harp also reappeared as part of Idumaean musical culture (fig.12; Peters and Thiersch, 1905, p.46). The lyre, however, lost its dominant role in music practice, although to a certain extent it retained its symbolic prominence, for example on the depictions of two types of lyre on the coins minted during the Bar-Kokhba revolt (132–5 CE, see BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS, fig.4) and on the city coins of Caesarea Panaeas (169–220 CE); these instruments are now recognized as the biblical kinnor and nebel (Bayer, 1968, pp.130–1). New wind instruments, such as the double aulos, appeared in a technically perfect form, suitable for sophisticated virtuoso performance (fig.13): the new way of making this instrument (from bone bound with copper or another metal; Braun, 1999, p.165) is deplored in the Babylonian Talmud ('Arakhin x.2) as an obstacle to producing the sound traditionally regarded as desirable – a typical example of the clash between new techniques of instrument construction and traditional aesthetics. In the case of the aulos, the social distinction that emerged between professional virtuosos and semi-professional or amateur musicians is particularly clear from a comparison of archaeological finds of wind instruments (compare IAA 35.3548 and IAA 81.1839).

11. Terracotta fragment of a man holding a lute; Beit-Govrin, Hellenistic I period (Archaeological Expedition no.1386, led by Prof. A. Kloner for the IAA)

The first Jewish musician known by name was a 'klezmer' of the Hellenistic period, Yakobius ben Yakobius, who is mentioned in a list of sheep and goat owners in the city of Samaria (north Egypt) as being an aulos player (144–55 CE; Tcherikover, 1957, p.171). The earliest known evidence for the use of the transverse flute in the Near East also dates from this period (e.g. the depictions on the city coins of Caesarea Panaeas, 169–220 CE; Meshorer, 1984–5). There is good reason to claim that in the liturgical music of the local Samaritan community the organ, a recently invented instrument, was used: the depiction of a portable pneumatic table organ with seven pipes, always accompanied by two pairs of forked cymbals, is seen on small terracotta oil lamps (Braun, 1999, Abb.V/4-14a).

The shofar first appears in iconography in the 2nd and 3rd centuries CE and features as part of a clearly symbolic group of Jewish cult objects (see BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS, fig.8). To date, the character of the Temple ḥaṣoṣerah has not been established for certain, although the instrument is generally understood to have been a form of metal trumpet: the wind instrument depicted on the Bar-Kokhba coins is, however, better interpreted as a type of oboe (Braun, 1999, Abb.V/7-3h), and the two trumpets on the relief of the Arch of Titus, which shows the treasures looted from the Temple by the Romans, are more probably Roman tubae (Pfanner, 1983; Yarden, 1991). The only depiction of the Roman tuba in ancient Israel/Palestine appears in an Idumaean context (see BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS, fig.2). The most convincing evidence of the use of a trumpet-like instrument at the Temple, which could be a trumpet or a shofar, is the text engraved on a 1st-century stone found near the Temple wall (le-beit ha-teqi'ah . . . : 'to the house of blowing . . . '; IAA 78.1415).

Along with the further fragmentation of local musical cultures and emergence of new practices, syncretic tendencies developed under the impact of Roman political power: the same instruments and musics may have been used in very different social contexts for the performance of music that might be inspired by an opposing ethos (e.g. the ḥalil as an instrument both of lamentation and drunkards, Isaiah v.11–12 and Jeremiah xlviii.36; Avenary, 1979, pp.10–22). There is a striking musical and ceremonial similarity between the bridal processions of the Jewish and Nabataean communities of the period (1 Maccabees ix.39; Mishnah, Soṭah ix.14; Babylonian Talmud, Ketubbot ii.17). Such ceremonies also share features of the triumphal processions of the Dionysus cult: Plutarch (Quaestiones convivales, vi.2) and Tacitus (Historiae, v:5) describe similar Jewish and Dionysian musical ceremonies. 'Syncretism, or shituf, as the rabbis called this recognition of plural divine control of the cosmos, was widespread' (Bickermann, 1988, p.252). It is obvious, however, that the frequent desecrations of the Temple during this time (e.g. 167 BCE) interrupted and disturbed the continuity of this musical tradition.

12. Wall painting depicting a harpist and a double-aulos player; Beit-Govrin Necropolis, 3rd century BCE

Certain aspects of Hellenistic and Roman cultural life were adopted in the province of Judaea. Gymnasia, competitive games and theatres were established in the major centres – Jerusalem, Tiberias and Caesarea – and had a syncretic influence on the music culture, particularly during the reign of Herod the Great (37 BCE–4 CE; see Josephus, Jewish Antiquities, xv.8.1). In Jerusalem, Gaza, Ashqelon and Sepphoris large private residences, some of which were owned by Jewish families, were richly decorated with mosaic floors and wall paintings that often depicted musical scenes (fig.13). These syncretic tendencies of the local music cultures were in sharp contrast to orthodoxy of the Jewish religion. A striking example is the emphatic repetition of the same verse in Daniel iii.5, 7, 10 and 15, in which foreign music and instruments announce the worship of the golden image in Babylon. Although the events described in the passage date from the time of Nebuchadnezzar, the text itself was probably written between 167 and 164 BCE and reflects conditions in the Hellenistic/Roman period.

According to post-biblical sources (3rd and 4th centuries CE) the Temple liturgy of the Herodian/Early Roman period (40 BCE–70 CE) was highly formalized, especially as regards the singing of psalms (Mishnah, Tamid vii.4; see also Mishnah, 'Arakhin ii), particularly the hallel (Psalms cxiii–cxviii). It is also assumed that the synagogue (beit ha-keneset: 'house of assembly') first became formalized in the Late Hellenistic period, initially as a secular and somewhat later as a religious institution. This certainly may imply some continuity of musical liturgy from the Temple to the synagogue.

13. Mosaic floor (detail) depicting a double-aulos player; Sepphoris, 3rd–4th century CE

The abrupt change occurred following the catastrophic year 70 CE, when the Roman army under Titus completely destroyed the Temple, thus initiating a new epoch for the Jewish people. Religious, spiritual and liturgical life had to be reorganized, and music was inevitably affected. The sacrifice was abolished and prayer took its place. The playing of musical instruments was also avoided, although this more probably resulted from the influence of over-zealous rabbis than because of a formal prohibition (McKinnon, 1979–80), and liturgical music became a purely vocal art. Singing and instrumental music performed by professionals, a part of the Temple liturgy according to biblical and post-biblical sources, gave way to mass participation by the lay congregation (and, naturally, psalmody disappeared from the synagogue until the 7th century at the earliest; McKinnon, 1986). If any form of continuity existed between the two institutions shortly before the destruction of the Temple, it was probably lost in the early centuries of synagogue worship. The only possible trace of Temple music that survives in Jewish worship today is a 'text-modelled orality' (Randhofer, 1998, p.77), that is, the formal organization of a liturgical text serving as the basis of the musical structures; the most obvious example of this in Jewish music is in psalmody, but other liturgical genres also show evidence of this practice and, according to Gerson-Kiwi (1961), this form of musical structure is of a 'Pan-Asiatic type'. As for Jewish secular music, it embarked upon its world-wide journey of acculturation, assimilation and integration with the musical cultures of other peoples, but without losing its unique national identity.

III. Liturgical and paraliturgical

1. INTRODUCTION. Religious gatherings are the main social context for the practice of traditional Jewish music. These occasions can be divided into two principal types: liturgical services, which are sanctioned by halakhah and therefore normative according to religious legislation; and paraliturgical events, which share some characteristics of the liturgical services but are optional. The Jewish liturgy has undergone many transformations through the ages, particularly in the past two centuries with the advent of the reformist movements. This introduction refers to traditional (i.e. Orthodox) liturgical and paraliturgical practices. Customs departing from orthodoxy, especially in Europe, are discussed later (see §III, 3(iv) below).

Jewish liturgical services consist of the public performance of a prescribed order of texts of different types and origins. Services usually take place in a synagogue (although they can also occur in other locations, such as a private home or hall, and even in open spaces out of doors) at fixed hours of the day. The texts are performed using different patterns of sound organization, ranging from plain recitation to highly developed melodies. Services take place three times daily, morning (shaḥarit), afternoon (minḥah) and evening ('arvit or ma'ariv), but four times on Sabbaths, Festivals and Holy Days – musaf being added between the morning and afternoon services – and five times on Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement) when the closing ne'ilah service is celebrated. Liturgical components are also part of life-cycle ceremonies: circumcisions (eight days after birth); bar-mitzvahs; weddings; and mourning vigils.

Liturgical services consist of five basic sections: pesuqei de-zimra ('verses of singing', called zemirot in the Sephardi tradition), consisting mostly of psalms and other biblical texts; shema' yisrael and its benedictions ('Hear, O Israel', Deuteronomy vi.5–9 and xi.13–23, Numbers xv.37–41: the main statement of the Jewish monotheistic credo); 'amidah ('standing'); seder taḥanunim ('order of supplications'); and the reading of the Torah. Most of these sections are separated by the qaddish (sanctification of God's name), a prayer in Aramaic and Hebrew. Not every service includes all these sections, for example the shema' yisrael is not performed at the afternoon service and the Torah is read only on Holy Days, Sabbaths, Mondays and Thursdays. On the other hand, substantial and unique sections are added to the liturgy of the High Holy Days (Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur), for example the seliḥot, a set of penitential prayers and poems (piyyuṭim) performed after the 'amidah. The term seliḥot also refers to an independent nightly service celebrated by Sephardi Jews during the month preceeding Rosh Hashanah and until Yom Kippur, and by the Ashkenazim starting the week before Rosh Hashanah

The core of all synagogue services is the series of berakhot ('blessings') generally known as the 'amidah ('standing': because the congregation stands while reciting it) but called tefillah ('prayer') in the Talmud and also termed shemoneh 'esreh ('eighteen') – a reference to the original number of blessings in the daily service (today there are 19). The 'amidah is recited silently by each individual and is repeated aloud by the leader of the prayer. The repetition of the 'amidah includes two important textual additions of musical significance, the qeddushah ('sanctification') and birkat kohanim ('priestly blessing').

The Torah (i.e. the Pentateuch, the Five Books of Moses) is divided into 54 portions (parashiyot), which are read, directly from the Scrolls deposited in the Holy Ark, in sequence on each Sabbath in an annual cycle beginning with Simḥat Torah (around the end of October). The Holy Ark is placed in the direction of Jerusalem. The Scrolls are taken out of the Ark for reading also on Mondays, Thursdays and Holy Days. The reading forms a special ceremony within the morning service that includes prayers before and after the opening of the Ark, a festive procession with the Scrolls, the elevation of the Scroll to be seen by the whole congregation, benedictions of the individuals who are honoured with the office of reading a part of the weekly portion (sometimes this role is acquired in a public auction held before the Torah service) and the procession for the return of the Scrolls to the Ark. Readings of other biblical texts, mostly from the Books of the Prophets, are appended to the reading of the Torah and are known as hafṭarah (see below, §III, 2(ii)).

Piyyuṭim (Hebrew liturgical poems) are a post-talmudic addition to the liturgy. These poems were composed at least as early as the 5th and 6th centuries CE for the purpose of embellishing the services. Only a fraction of the thousands of piyyuṭim composed throughout the ages has remained in the normative liturgy. Paraliturgical devotions and life-cycle events continued, however, to nurture the creation of new Hebrew religious poetry (also called pizmonim) until the early 20th century.

The performance of a traditional service is extremely flexible. The beginning is marked by the gradual flow of individuals into the synagogue, not by a single, solemn opening act. This informality derives from the idea that the introductory sections (pesuqei de-zimra), although normative, are not considered the core of the service. The formal beginning of the morning and evening liturgies is marked by the call barekhu et adonai ha-mevorakh ('Bless the Lord, the blessed One'), chanted immediately after the pesuqei de-zimra by the individual conducting the prayer.

In the synagogue it is the duty of each Jew to perform the order of prayers by himself. The entire performance is vocal and only men participate actively. The duty of prayer, in its liturgical sense, is not obligatory for women, who sit in a separate gallery. The congregation sits during most of the service, and stands only for the performance of certain sections.

Depending on the tradition of each community, the services are led by one individual who stands on a podium (bimah) located in the front (Ashkenazi usage), the centre (Sephardi) or back (Italian) of the synagogue facing the Holy Ark. In talmudic times (3rd–5th centuries CE), as in most communities to this day, the services were conducted by a precentor called sheliaḥ ha-ṣibbur ('envoy of the congregation'), often abbreviated to shaṣ̃ṣ. A beautiful voice was not a necessary requirement (although it was desirable) to fulfil this function, at least until the geonic period (9th century). In Muslim Spain, from the 11th century onwards, the 'musical' skills of the shaṣ̃ṣ (rather than his piety alone) became a consideration for his election. The duty of the shaṣ̃ṣ is to lead the public sections of the prayers by reciting them aloud (especially the 'amidah) on behalf of the congregation who generally follows (silently or whispering in parallel to the shaṣ̃ṣ) and interacts with him by answering with short responses, such as 'amen'. Within the same synagogue, the role of shaṣ̃ṣ may rotate among several individuals.

The office of the ḥazzan (synagogue cantor), that is, a musically gifted, permanent and appointed shaṣ̃ṣ, developed particularly after the 15th century in ashkenaz ('Germany', see §III, 3(iii–iv) below), Italy and throughout the Sephardi diaspora. For example, in the Portuguese Jewish communities of western Europe (17th–19th centuries) the cantor ranked second to the rabbi in the community hierarchy, his election was a matter of public concern and his duties were detailed in the community's statutes. The cantor sometimes fulfilled other duties, such as teacher of children, sexton, scribe and ritual slaughterer. Generally the cantors' lore was transmitted orally from one generation to the next and no formal training developed. Only in 19th-century Germany did the education of cantors in professional musical skills (e.g. reading musical notation and choir conducting) become the concern of gentile authorities, who intervened by setting, for example, curricula and standards for the training and duties of cantors. The professionalization of the synagogue cantors in the Austro-Hungarian Empire in the second half of the 19th century led to the establishment of cantors' associations, which protected the rights of their members, established patterns for professional training and published musical scores and journals. The formalized teaching of cantors spread to the Sephardi world in the early 20th century. A special course for Sephardi cantors functioned at the rabbinical academy on the Island of Rhodes between the World Wars. In past decades, schools of cantors offering formal degrees, and courses in, for example, solfeggio and voice training have become the norm in the USA and Israel.

The tradition of new cantors arising from within the synagogue congregation, however, has not disappeared entirely. Moreover, some Jewish communities frown upon the very idea that the cantor's role is primarily a musical function, preferring their services to be led by a pious shaṣ̃ṣ. This is particularly noticeable in several ḥasidic communities where a ba'al tefillah ('master of prayer', i.e. a deeply inspired shaṣ̃ṣ) is favoured over the ḥazzan.

Established traditions govern the degree of musicality of each service, determining the tempo of recitation of the introductory psalms, the amount, proportion of elaboration and speed of the recitation of the prayers, the length of the qeddushah melody, the selection of metric melodies for prose or for poetic texts, the inclusion of an adopted new melody or of a musical composition, and so on. Such traditions, however, may be altered through an elaborate process of negotiation between the cantors, the authorities of the congregation and the congregation itself, or by an outburst of creativity from an individual. No single formula explains the complex set of social rules determining what a traditional Jewish service will sound like. While, superficially, every service is a new, unique performance that creates different musical moments at every performance, at a deeper structural level all services for the same occasion share remarkable similarities in the roles of the performers, in the musical repertory, tempo, duration and so on. Musicality in the synagogue is largely controlled by unwritten local rules.

Throughout history, the music of the Jewish liturgy has undergone constant changes because it is an open system. A main trend in this process of change in the continuous 'musicalization', this is, the expansion of the truly 'musical' sections. This has occurred in several layers: the development of prayer recitation through modal improvisation; the addition of poetical sections (piyyuṭim) with metric melodies; the use of metric melodies for sections in prose; and the overlap of the musical style for one section of the liturgy into the performance of another, such as the application of a piyyuṭ melody to a qaddish in order to invest this text (which is repeated several times in all services) with additional temporal significance. Changes in the liturgical music repertory are also a reflection of developments in Jewish social life, particularly the relationship between Jews and the surrounding non-Jewish culture, and the tension between mystical and non-mystical approaches within Judaism. Major shifts occurred in Europe after the Emancipation, when the concept of music in its Western sense (e.g. preconcieved, notated compositions, choral arrangements and instrumental music) began to permeate the synagogue. Since then, synagogue music has changed, sometimes dramatically, in both traditional and liberal communities.

The normative liturgy is a particularly structured form of expressing religiosity. The predictability and routine of the public worship, added to the tendency of the rabbis not to allow elaborated musical performances, led to the development of additional, private devotions, and eventually to the emergence of non-normative, paraliturgical customs. Examples of such devotions are the ritual chanting of the entire Book of Psalms or of sections of the Sefer ha-zohar (Book of Splendour; one of the principal texts of Jewish mysticism) in a variety of social contexts.

Mysticism was a major influence in the evolution of paraliturgical devotions. In the 16th century the mystical circles of Safed (now Zefat, Israel) were particularly active in developing new rituals (many rooted in medieval practices) in which singing was a crucial component. One such ritual is qabbalat shabbat ('welcoming of the Sabbath'), which includes the famous poem Lekha dodi liqrat kallah by Rabbi Salomon Alkabetz (*c*1505–84). This text, which rapidly spread to all corners of the Diaspora, has become the hallmark of the ceremony (see below, §2(iv), ex.8 for a Sephardi setting). Qabbalat shabbat also includes passages from the Song of Songs, Psalms and Mishnah. Other kabbalistic rituals from Safed, based on similar selections of texts and on new religious poetry, took the form of nightly vigils called tiqqun ḥaṣot ('institution of midnight [prayer]'; dedicated to the acceleration of redemption) and baqqashot ('petitions'; see §4(ii) below).

Ḥasidism, the grass-roots mystical branch of east European Jewry following the leadership and teachings of Rabbi Israel ben Eliezor, called Ba'al Shem Tov (1688–1760), also expresses its religious fervour in new rituals. Music, in the form of textless vocal compositions called nigunim, plays a vital role in the new rites of ḥasidism, such as the tish (Yiddish: 'table') – the festive, public meal of the rebbe (Yiddish: 'rabbi') in the presence of all his flock, which occurs at the start of Sabbaths, Holy Days and other special occasions – and the hitva'adut, a gathering for the purpose of reinforcing the faith of the ḥasidim (see §III, 3(iii) below).

Ḥasidic and Sephardi communities both share the faith in the commemoration of great rabbis and saints. The pilgrimage to the rabbis' tombs known as the hillulah, a custom related to the more mystical trends of Judaism, is usually accompanied by singing and instrumental music.

2. SYNAGOGUE MUSIC AND ITS DEVELOPMENT.

(i) Psalmody.

(a) The Psalter and psalmody. Jewish tradition recognizes King David as the author of the Book of Psalms. Indeed, more than half the psalms are attributed to him by their title or associated with some event in his life. But even those attributed to other persons, such as Moses (Psalm xc) or Asaph (Psalms l and lxxiii–lxxxiii) and those that later Jewish tradition ascribed to Adam, Abraham and Melchisedech (Psalms cii, lxxxix and cx respectively) were also said to have come through the mouth of David (e.g. Midrash, Shir ha-shirim rabbah, iv) and were inspired by God. Tradition attributes even the post-exilic Psalm cxxxiii to David, who through prophecy envisioned the captive Levites by the rivers of Babylon.

King David's authorship and authority endowed the Psalms with special sanctity. Belief in their divine inspiration made their recitation an important means of praising God and at the same time receiving His blessing, as well as divine national and private salvation. Chanting or singing psalms was the focus of daily worship in the Temple, and it later became part of the synagogue liturgy. There, the psalms serve as opening and closing prayers in various services, especially in the daily morning service. Special selections are sung during the Holy Days; thus, the hallel praise (Psalms cxiii–cxviii) is chanted at the Three Pilgrimage Festivals (Pesaḥ, Shavu'ot, Sukkot), Ḥanukkah and New Moons.

The Psalms express a broad spectrum of human emotions, and so they became the most important source of paraliturgical devotions, both public and private. Many communities chant the entire book in public (usually on Sabbath afternoons), devoted Jews, especially the elderly, do the same every day or over a week, in small groups or privately. Jewish tradition attributes considerable healing power to various psalms and many are believed to ward off evil powers and calamity. The devotional routine recitation of individual psalms and the entire book for healing are performed to a uniform chant. Special psalms with distinct chants, however, are recited publicly or privately at times of distress.

Despite its centrality in Jewish worship, the musical structure of Hebrew psalmody has not yet been sufficiently researched. Unlike the Christian tradition of Gregorian chant, no specific regulations and no uniform chants accompany psalmodic practices in the synagogue. On the contrary, Jewish psalmody is relatively free and varied. Furthermore, an overwhelming number of psalmodic chants and a great variety of chant-related traditions and functions exist in Jewish communities throughout the Diaspora and still await research. An important attempt to tackle the difficult problems of Jewish psalmody is Flender's study of some Middle Eastern and North African communities (1992).

(b) Verse structure and chant. The basis of psalmody in both synagogue and Church is the dichotomic structure of its verses. Most psalm verses are constructed of two parallel hemistiches (parallelismus membrorum) and, frequently, each hemistich is further divided into two segments ('the continuous dichotomy': Wickes, 1881/R, pp.38–53). But recent research has shown that a great number of verses are actually tripartite (Flender, 1992). Jewish psalmodies preserve this basic verse structure. Yet while the point of the half-verse is carefully marked by a half-cadence formula and a caesura, the end of a verse may sometimes be connected to the beginning of the next (Lachmann, 1940; repr. in the original Ger., 1978, pp.95, 108–10) and the cadential formula delayed to the first pausal point of the following verse. Unlike the usual Gregorian psalmody, where one recitation note (tonus currens, tenor, tuba) is used for both hemistiches, Jewish psalmodies tend to use additional recitation notes, the one for the second half-verse may be higher or lower than that used for the first. When it is lower, the psalmody resembles the Gregorian tonus peregrinus (Herzog and Hajdu, 1968). An initium formula may be missing, or it may begin each verse; sometimes it precedes the second recitation note as well. Jewish chants tend to vary the melodic patterns of the psalmody and to embellish the recitation – hovering around a note rather than mechanically repeating it – and to adorn the cadential points with melismas (see also Avenary, 1953).

Some of these features are illustrated in Flender's transcription of a Moroccan rendition of Psalm xix (Jerusalem: National Sound Archives Y 1692; ex.2). In most of the verses, the recitation tone for the first hemistich is G and for the second one F♯. The musical dichotomy follows the textual one: half-verses end on F♯ and full verses on G. But the cadential formula is postponed to the beginning of the following verse if the latter is of a tripartite division.

(c) Performing practice. The performing practice of the psalms is closely connected to their liturgical or paraliturgical functions and is influenced by old local traditions. Idelsohn (1929/R, pp.20–21) summarized three responsorial 'forms in which the Psalms and prayers were rendered' in the Temple: (a) the leader intoned half-verses and the congregation always repeated the first half-verse of the psalm as a refrain; (b) the congregation repeated each half-verse after the leader; and (c) the leader and congregation alternated full verses. This practice was modified in the synagogue, where psalms can be heard in antiphonal, responsorial and choral (i.e. congregational) renditions. Antiphonal alternations of verse between two individuals or two groups are rare; but can be found among some North African communities (e.g. in Algiers). More common are responsorial practices, a great variety of which exist. Thus, for instance, the Kurdish Jews chant Psalm xcii alternating full verses between precentor and congregation, but the shift always occurs at the half-verse (Flender 1992, p.125).

The Yemenite Jews preserve an ancient Temple tradition of chanting the hallel in which the congregation responds with the word halleluyah after each half-verse by the precentor, and repeats the first half-verse of each psalm as a refrain (see §III, 5 below). Ashkenazi Jews chant Psalm cxxx and similar rogation psalms so that each verse is sung by the precentor and is then repeated using the same chant by the congregation. Choral chanting by the entire congregation is the rule for those psalms that are part of the daily liturgy. In Sephardi and Middle Eastern communities these are chanted without a precentor. Among the Ashkenazim, the psalms are chanted individually by the congregants with the precentor singing the last verses of each psalm, thus directing the pace of the service.

This form of psalmody is by no means the only way of singing psalms among Jews. Important or favourite psalms are sung to special melodies during the liturgy or in paraliturgical functions. Thus, for instance, during the Sabbath service Psalm xxix is sung to a particular tune or composition when it accompanies the procession of the Torah Scroll. Psalms are sometimes chanted in long melismatic cantorial recitatives. In east European Ashkenazi communities the first penitential seliḥot service begins with a cantorial rendition of the last verses of Psalm cxlv, and in Syrian communities various psalms serve as opening solo recitatives (Arabic muwwāl) which are sung according to the Arabic maqāmāt improvisations (see MODE, §V, 2). On the other hand, chant formulae resembling psalmodies are used for various other poetic or even prose texts. Finally, it seems quite clear that the cantillation system of Hebrew scripture, namely the public reading of the Pentateuch, the Prophets and books of the Hagiographa is based on psalmodic concepts.

(ii) Biblical cantillation.

(a) The role of cantillation. Jewish lore and religious laws place special emphasis on the chanting of Scripture. Early rabbinical sources regard chanting as a primary means of comprehension and retention of all sacred texts, especially the Bible. The Babylonian Talmud (Megillah 32a) quotes Rabbi Yohanan's dictum: 'Whosoever reads Scripture without a melody or studies law without a tune, of him [the prophet] says: "Moreover I gave them statutes that were no good . . ."' (Ezekiel xx.25). Chanting biblical and post-biblical passages is an important foundation of Jewish culture and is done in private study and at public ceremonies. Traditionally, even sermons were delivered in chant and this is still the practice in some Jewish communities. Special emphasis, however, is laid on the ceremonial chanting of Scripture as a liturgical ritual.

Jewish liturgical regulations require that various portions of the Bible be read ceremoniously in public services. The entire Pentateuch (Torah) is read in a yearly cycle during the Sabbath morning services. Short sections of the weekly portions are read on Sabbath afternoons and at the morning service on Mondays and Thursdays. Special selections are used on Holy Days, New Moon and fast days. Chapters from the Prophets (called hafṭarah) follow the Pentateuch reading on Sabbaths, Holy Days and fast days. Particular books are read on Holy and commemorative days: Esther is read at Purim; Lamentations on Tish'ah be-av (9th Av, commemorating the destruction of the Temple); and in some communities the Song of Songs, Ruth and Ecclesiastes are read at Pesaḥ (Passover), Shavu'ot (Pentecost) and Sukkot (Tabernacles) respectively.

The liturgical reading of Scripture is performed in chant and is usually executed by a professional or semi-professional reader called ba'al qeriah or ba'al qore (in the Yemenite tradition the Pentateuch and in many other communities the portions from the Prophets are chanted by laymen).

While the duty of reading Scripture with exact pronunciation and proper chant was emphasized from an early period, the original text of the Hebrew Bible itself gave no indications of either. It consisted of paragraphs containing words made up of groups of regular consonants. No vowels, special consonants or sentence divisions were indicated in the ancient books and these are still missing in the Scrolls of the Torah, the Books of the Prophets and Hagiographa used for the ceremonious reading in the synagogue.

(b) The Tiberian system of 'ṭe'amim'. Vowel markings and sentence divisions first appear in Babylonian and Palestinian manuscripts of the early 9th century CE. However, since the notation of these sources shows a certain consistency, it is assumed that their methods developed about two centuries earlier (Dotan, 1971–2) and that the inception of the notation might have coincided with the initial use of codices side by side with the Scrolls. The attempts to furnish the text with reading signs culminated in the comprehensive system developed by the Masoretic School of Tiberias during the late 9th century and early 10th. Their achievements are exemplified in the excellent codices of Aleppo (*c*920 CE, JNUL) and Leningrad (B 19a, *c*1009 CE), on which modern editions of the Hebrew Bible are based.

The Tiberian scholars utilized an ingenious mixture of dots and little geometrical figures above and below the words to help the reader pronounce the text properly, to divide it according to the traditional interpretation and to chant following the accepted melodic patterns (fig.14). This was achieved by combining two concurrent systems. One, called niqqud, indicated the vowels and special consonants, while the other, called ṭe'amim, had a threefold task: to mark the proper accentuation of the words; to show the traditional divisions of the verses; and to indicate appropriate chant patterns. The best recent exposition of the Tiberian system and its grammatical and syntactical aspects is by Breuer (2/1989–90).

The Tiberian method uses a uniform niqqud system for all 24 books of the Hebrew Bible, but it differentiates two systems of ṭe'amim. One, ṭa'amei kaf-alef sefarim, is used for the 21 books of prose and prophecy, and the other, ṭa'amei emet, is for the so-called books of poetry, namely Psalms, Proverbs and the poetic parts of Job. The systems consist of graphical signs that are similar in form, but which differ considerably in their interpretation. They are classified as either disjunctives, or 'lords' (mafsiqim), and conjunctives, or 'servants' (meḥabberim). The disjunctives mark the end of the verses and divide each verse into phrases and sub-phrases, thereby expressing the syntactic hierarchy within the verse. It is therefore customary to rank these signs according to regal hierarchy. The conjunctives, on the other hand, help to unite words into phrases or sub-phrases, and they always lead towards a disjunctive. The cantillation signs and hierarchy of the 21 books are indicated in Table 1.

The names of the ṭe'amim signs derive from their function (sof-pasuq: 'end of verse'), graphical shape (darga: 'stair'; seġol from seġolta: 'bunch of grapes') musical pattern (tevir: perhaps 'broken motif'), or cheironomical motion (tipḥa: 'hand-breadth'). The system contains three additional signs: (1) meteġ ('curb', 'bit'), a short vertical line under an unstressed syllable signalling a secondary accentuation of a word; (2) paseq ('cut'), a long vertical line after a word with a conjunctive sign, indicating a rhetorical stop after the word; and (3) maqqaf ('hyphen') connecting one word to the next.

The great number of cantillation signs when fewer would suffice for punctuation clearly suggests that they served as musical markings. Jewish tradition treats them as symbols of motifs and not as indications of individual pitches as in modern Western notation. The length of a motif varies from a single note to a long melisma. Usually the accented syllable of the word is chanted with the main note or notes of the motif, and the unaccented syllables receive the preceding auxiliary note or two (Rosowsky, 1957). When time is pressing and the chanting fast, readers tend to ignore the minor disjunctives, unless an embellished motif is indicated.

Different musical interpretations of the ṭe'amim developed in various regions of the Diaspora. (Ex.3 gives east European Ashkenazi and Western Sephardi tables of motifs.) While some communities attempt to find a musical equivalent for each sign, others highlight the main disjunctive and gloss over the secondary ones. It is quite possible that the latter follow the older Babylonian system.

Currently eight main musical traditions of cantillation exist:

1. The Middle East: Iran, Bukhara, Kurdistan, Georgia, and the northern parts of Iraq. This is an old tradition, perhaps based partially on the Babylonian system of ṭe'amim. Reading in simple psalmodic patterns was common in the rural communities (ex.4; see also §III, 6, ex.21, and §III, 7(iv), ex.26 below).

2. Southern Arabian Peninsula: Yemenite and Hadramawt. This ancient tradition is based on an old system of ṭe'amim. It recognizes only four main patterns: (a) molikh ('mover') used for the conjunctives and some minor disjunctives; (b) mafsiq ('pausal') for most third degree disjunctives; (c) ma'amid for most second degree disjunctives; and (d) the patterns of etnaḥta and sof-pasuq. The Yemenite Jews recognize only two styles of cantillation: the simple and the ornate (ex.5; see also §III, 5, ex.20 below; Sharvit, 1982).

3. The Near East: Turkey, Syria, central Iraq, Lebanon, and Egypt. Known as the 'Eastern Sephardi tradition', it has become the dominant style among the non-Ashkenazi communities of Israel. The readers of the Pentateuch strive to give musical meaning to each sign, but some of the signs are ignored in reading the Prophets and other books. The musical motifs are influenced by the Arabic maqām (see MODE, §V, 2). The Pentateuch is chanted mainly in patterns that can be related to maqām siga.

4. North Africa: Libya, Tunisia, Algeria and Morocco. This seems to combine the old Sephardi tradition of pre-exilic times (i.e. before 1492) with North African pentatonic patterns. The African influence is especially marked in Atlas Mountain communities far from the Mediterranean shores.

5. Italy. The ancient tradition of the Italian Jews may still be heard in Rome and in the Roman Jewish community of Jerusalem. Cheironomy is still used by some readers.

6. The Sephardi and Portugese communities of Europe. It is not clear to what degree the so-called Western Sephardim of today preserve features of the original Sephardi cantillation melodies of Spain. Part of their current tradition is related to the Moroccan system.

7. West European Ashkenazim: German-speaking countries, France, some communities in the Netherlands, and England. The tradition, which developed in medieval times, was first recorded in Hebrew grammar books by non-Jewish authors during the 16th century such as Johannes Reuchlin's De accentibus et orthographia linguae Hebraicae (Hagenau, 1518; see §III, 3, fig.15 below).

8. East European Ashkenazim. The tradition, which developed out of the Western Ashkenazi cantillation, has become the dominant style in Ashkenazi communities worldwide.

Within each of the above regions are distinguished diverse sub-traditions according to the geographical distribution of the various communities. Furthermore, each tradition has different melodic patterns for various divisions of the Bible or for the different liturgical occasions in which the reading is performed. The east European Ashkenazi tradition, for example, consists of six musical systems: (1) the Pentateuch, regular chant; (2) the Pentateuch, High Holy Day chant; (3) the Prophets; (4) the Book of Esther; (5) the Book of Lamentations; and (6) Song of Songs, Ruth and Ecclesiastes.

(c) Ṭa'amei emet. The system of ṭa'amei emet for the Psalms, Ecclesiastes and the poetical parts of Job is more complicated than that for the other 21 books of the Hebrew Bible, because it endeavours to represent various subtle bi- and tripartite verse structures. Here too, the signs are divided into disjunctives (mafsiqim) and conjunctives (meḥabberim), but the choice of the disjunctive depends on the length of the verse and on other disjunctives that precede or follow it. Furthermore, identical signs can indicate different degrees of closure, and, depending on the context and location, some signs can serve either as dividers of the verse or, vice versa, as connectors of words within phrases. Finally, the exact hierarchy of the disjunctives is disputed among scholars. Table 2 is a much-simplified classification of the system.

The seemingly unnecessary complexity of this system and the redundancy of many of its signs should indicate that it was meant to describe or prescribe detailed musical patterns for chanting the texts. But, unlike the signs of the 21 books, which have similar musical interpretations in various Jewish traditions, the signs for Psalms, Job and Ecclesiastes have no single systematic musical interpretation in any Jewish tradition. The traditional chants of Job and Ecclesiastes, which have survived in only a few communities, and the various chants of the Psalter in all Jewish communities, all follow general psalmodic patterns that seem to ignore the detailed Tiberian system. Thus, scholars such as Dotan (in his Prolegomenon to Wickes, 1881; repr. 1970) and Herzog (1971–2/R, p.1332) have expressed serious doubt about the relationship of the ṭeʿamim to current Jewish psalmody. Avenary (1963, p.22) maintained that 'the [Tiberian] accentuation of the Psalter ... has never been realized musically'. More recently, Flender (1992) has shown some correspondence between a few Tiberian signs and the psalmodic patterns of some Jewish communities from the Near East and Morocco. Flender confirmed that the main melodic divisions of the psalmodies he examined correspond to the first- and second-class disjunctives. He also demonstrated that the rules governing the overflow of the melodic formulae into a new verse depend on the tripartite nature of the new verse, which is invariably marked by the disjunctives ʿoleh veyored or reviʿa (see ex.2 above).

Finally, he showed that in some psalmodies certain melodic patterns appear consistently with combinations of the signs zinnor-galgal-'oleh veyored. Future research may show whether Flender's analysis could be fruitfully explored with reference to other signs and different communities, or whether the limits have been reached in exploring a long-lost tradition of chanting the Psalms according to the Tiberian system.

(d) Theoretical discussions of the Tiberian systems. In his review of Jewish biblical cantillation, Avenary (1963, pp.22–30) describes a conflict between two contradictory chant styles: the 'melodic punctuation style'; and the 'group style'. The former, 'an immediate outcome of Biblical verse construction', follows the natural punctuation of the biblical verses and supports it by initial motifs, recitation notes (tonus currens, tenor, tuba), resting and final motifs. The latter furnishes each verse with disjunctive and conjunctive ṭe'amim that are 'grouped together in units according to need'. Since the groups of graphical signs 'evoke corresponding tone-groups', therefore 'the verse sounds like a chain of melodic phrases'. The Tiberian system is the epitome of the 'group style', which is learned and analytical. Despite its normative status (Bibles with Tiberian accents are used in all Jewish communities) the system was never universally accepted. It 'reached full development with the Ashkenazim of Europe and in the ancient Jewish centres of Iraq', but the Jews of Iran, western North Africa and Yemen preferred the melodic punctuation style even for the cantillation of the Pentateuch, and the Sephardim realized the Tiberian system only with 'a certain reluctancy'.

While Avenary's view is of great value, an alternative interpretation of the formation of the Tiberian ṭe'amim can be suggested. That this system, like its predecessors, divides most of the biblical verses, even the prose ones, into two segments should indicate that it is ultimately rooted in psalmodic chant. The Tiberian scholars enriched the psalmodic patterns with detailed groupings of conjunctives and disjunctives, which meant that they were able to subdivide the half-verses according to syntax and to adorn the psalmodic patterns with a mosaic of melodic motifs. The Tiberian system was thus an ingenious combination of psalmody and centonization, but it proved too complex for some communities, who preferred to stick to the older psalmodic patterns, whereas for others it served as a challenge and they modified their chants for reading Scripture accordingly. Yet even for the latter, the Tiberian system of the books of Psalms, Ecclesiastes and Job was still too learned and it conflicted with the need to chant the Psalter in the most heartfelt form, therefore it largely failed.

There are good reasons to believe that the two Tiberian systems of the ṭe'amim originally represented a living tradition of chanting the Hebrew Bible. But the diversity of the Jewish traditions of cantillation makes it difficult, some would say impossible, to reconstruct the original chants. Nevertheless, from the Renaissance to this day scholars have been fascinated by the challenge and suggested various solutions (see Weil, 1995, pp.1–7).

The most important modern attempt was made by A.Z. Idelsohn (HoM, i, 1914/R, pp.18–23; ii, 1922/R, pp.5–32; his theory is summarized in 1929/R, pp.35–71). Through an ingenious process of melodic analysis and a brilliant comparative study of various Jewish musical cultures, he endeavoured to show that the cantillation systems in distant countries share similar motifs. These melodic patterns, some of which he presented in comparative tables, must have originated in ancient pre-exilic times and they formed the basis for the modes that have shaped synagogue music. Idelsohn did not attempt a detailed reconstruction of the music of the Tiberian systems, but he maintained that it was founded on the basis of the ancient motifs. Idelsohn's theory has been criticized for overemphasizing the common features of the motifs and ignoring the important modal and other structural factors that tie the motifs to their local musical cultures (Shiloah, 1992, p.108). It was also pointed out (Weil, 1995, p.5) that the motifs known today have only reached the present having 'undergone complex evolutionary phases', including degeneration, acculturation and so on, and that therefore they cannot testify to the original patterns.

A different approach was taken by Haïk-Vantoura (1978). She acknowledged the impossibility of reconstructing the original Tiberian chants out of the current traditions of the various Jewish communities. Therefore she attempted to reconstruct them on the basis of the graphical shapes and positioning of the ṭe'amim. For her, the signs under the letter represent notes in a scale and those above indicate ornamentation. Using this method, she constructed melodies that she claimed were implicit in the ṭe'amim and go back to biblical times. She stated that the proof of her theory was her ability to construct aesthetically pleasing melodies for biblical verses. This and other features of her theory, however, have been severely criticized for ignoring the grammatical nature of the signs and for the distance of her scale and melodies from any Middle Eastern musical tradition (see Ringer, 1977; Weil, 1995, p.6).

The latest attempt is that of Weil (1995). He attacked the problem from many angles including the grammatical intricacies of the ṭe'amim, their complex order, and the rabbinical and traditional interpretations of their musical values. He began by constructing a melodic theory based on current ethnomusicological concepts and expressed in chain-contours of descending scales and sequences. He then tried to show that such chains could be indicated by the graphical as well as grammatical structure of the ṭe'amim. Finally he analysed cantillation chants of various Jewish traditions showing their relationships to the chain-contours. This was the basis for an as yet unrealized attempt to create a complex model that would ultimately present the melodic structure of the Tiberian system.

(iii) Modal improvisation of prayers. In his efforts to show that Jewish music in all countries is Semitic in character, Idelsohn (1929/R, p.26) pointed out modal improvisation as one of the characteristics that tie all Jewish musical traditions to their origins in the Middle East. Modal improvisation in liturgical music is probably as old as the synagogue itself and is indeed common to all the Jewish traditions. During the first five centuries CE the words of the prayers, as well as their music, were improvised (Elbogen, 1993, p.4; Idelsohn, 1929/R, pp.102–5). However, with the emergence of uniform texts and after the canonization of the prayers in the 10th century (Hoffman, 1979, pp.160–71), improvisation became the preserve of music alone.

The first records of improvised chants are found in central European cantorial manuscripts of the 18th century (Adler, 1989), although references to the practice are found much earlier. Much of the evidence concerning cantorial improvisations in past centuries comes from the complaints of rabbis against various cantorial abuses. A particularly common complaint was that cantors use improvisation for self-glorification and vocal ostentation. Others castigate the cantors for ignoring or contradicting the structure and meaning of the texts, and for their long vocalises that make it 'impossible to maintain true devotion' (Werner, 1976, pp.112–14). An example is the description by the Spanish poet Judah al-Ḥarizi (*c*1170–1235) of a cantor he heard in Baghdad (Shiloah, 1992, pp.68–9):

'. . . and when he finished his hymns he . . . stood there proudly, gesticulating, moving his shoulders. And raised his right foot and put it down again. And moved backward a bit and opened the hidden vaults of his wisdom. And brought forth its treasures and began to recite poems and songs, all of them tattered, halt and blind, following round-about paths, without rhythm or meter, without form or content.'

The passage concludes with the congregation fleeing the synagogue because of the utter boredom caused by the cantor's 'endless canticles'.

Despite the harsh criticism, modal improvisation was and still is one of the most important elements of traditional synagogue chant, perhaps because it answers some basic psychological and aesthetic needs in Jewish culture (Yasser, 1966). But the nature of Jewish chants makes it difficult to distinguish between common melismatic embellishments, cantilena passages that are transmitted orally and bona fide improvisations.

In its simplest form, Jewish modal improvisation is an amplification of the element of variation that exists in all the traditional chants. Most chants are centonized melodies – mosaics constructed out of opening patterns, partial cadences, pre-concluding and cadential formulae. Yet the patterns and cadences never exist in a fixed melodic form, but are manifest in myriad variations. Because chants were transmitted orally, each community, synagogue and precentor sang them differently, and no two performances would be the same (Frigyesi, 1982–3). This constant variety agrees with the nature and aesthetic of Middle Eastern oral culture. In Jewish practice, however, it also relieves the tedium of repeating the mandatory liturgical texts and helps uplift the spirit of prayer. Therefore, when festivity is sought, the cantor is expected to expand the variations artistically by embellishing the traditional patterns. He is even allowed to deviate for a while from the these patterns and insert some melodic innovations, on condition that he return to the traditional chant at the end of the prayer. Frequently the artistic and creative cantor may find his inventiveness constrained by the simple chant patterns and would like to soar above them. In such cases he would turn to the general modality considered by his community to be appropriate for that particular prayer, day and service. He would then exploit the many possibilities of the mode and frequently modulate to related scales. The modes may be those that are an integral part of the Jewish musical tradition of the community, or they may be foreign. In east European Ashkenazi synagogues professional cantors combine the traditional adonai malakh shteyger (see §III, 3(iii) below) with its European counterpart, the major mode; in the 'Oriental' communities, the Arabic maqāmāt are the main vehicle for improvisation (see MODE, §V, 2).

In certain communities the cantor is tolerated or even adored if he introduces foreign tunes into his improvisation. Thus, again in an Ashkenazi synagogue, a cantor may quote part of an aria in minor tonality from Massenet's Werther while improvising in the cantorial maġen avot shteyger (similar traits are cited in Wohlberg, 1982, p.162), whereas in the Jerusalem-Sephardi community, the cantor may quote a song by the Egyptian popular composer Abdul Wahab.

Modal improvisations, which are based on embellishments, are intended to enhance the beauty of the liturgical text and to glorify it. An excerpt from Shiloah's transcription of the qeddushah (sanctification) prayer by a cantor from Ioánnina (Yanina tradition), Greece (1992, p.97; given here as ex.6) shows to what extremes a cantor can go in order to adorn the first word of a revered prayer.

Old Ashkenazi prayer books provide devotional texts that are meant to be uttered silently by the congregation while the cantor embellishes certain prayers, such as the initial call barekhu et adonai ha-mevorakh!

Improvisations serve to elucidate the prayers by underlining important words with emotionally charged motifs and through various means of tone painting, such as madrigalisms. However, the music often takes precedence over the text: words are repeated, phrases and even words are broken in order to allow the development of a beautiful musical idea.

Embellishment and improvisation add festivity to the prayers and so increase in proportion to the solemnity of the service or of the particular prayer. The sanctity of certain texts, however, precludes ornamentation. As a rule, God's name is never embellished, let alone repeated for musical purposes, and certain important prayers, such as the shema' and, in some communities, the first benediction of the 'amidah, are never modally improvised.

Improvisation is seldom used for the regular public reading of Scripture, but it is expected for special texts.

Ex.6 Beginning of the qedushah, Ioánnina (Yanina) tradition of Greece (Shiloah, 1992, p.97)

Thus, in some Turkish and Middle Eastern communities of the Eastern Sephardi tradition, the Ten Commandments are honoured with an embellished reading, and the most gifted readers render each Commandment in a different maqām, choosing each to suit its contents (Shiloah, 1992, p.248, n.4). Improvisation is most commonly used in singing the piyyuṭim (liturgical poems) added to the mandatory prayers on special Sabbaths, Festivals and Holy Days. In the Moroccan and Middle Eastern communities the most important opportunities for improvisation are the baqqashot gatherings on Sabbaths in winter before dawn (see §III, 4(iii–iv) below). During these ceremonies, congregational piyyuṭim are prefaced with cantorial recitatives in the Arabic style of muwwāl. Cantors are expected to develop a maqām, to modulate to related modes and to return to the original one, thus leading towards the ensuing congregational song. Similar recitatives, with instrumental accompaniment, are sung in the same communities at various family festivities. Among the Yemenite Jews, the main avenue of improvisation is the shir (Arabic nashid), the opening song followed by the shir (rhythmical song with drumming and dance) and ḥallel (a closing benediction) which are the essentials for celebrations in the home (Adaqi and Sharvit, 1981, p.xxxii; Bahat, 1995, p.xlv; see §IV, 2(i)(a) below).

In some communities, especially in Morocco, additional, nonsensical syllables, such as a-ha-na-na or ne-ne-ne are pronounced with short melismas and long vocalises (ex.7). Gerson-Kiwi (1967) believed that the extraneous syllables are inspired by mystical or kabbalistic concepts. However, it seems more plausible that they are a simple means of supporting the vocalises. They may also serve as vocal substitutions for the missing instrumental passages, or they are used as fillers to fit the music into the structure of the Moroccan-Andalusian songs. Among the east European Ashkenazim, it is common to insert syllables such as oi-yo-yoi, or oi-vei into cantorial improvisations, in order to express deep grief and to invoke God's compassion (Vinaver, 1995, no.19). Imitation of musical instruments was part of the cantorial improvisation style and mannerisms in the Ashkenazi communities during the 18th century and the early 19th. Some cantors accompanied their improvisations with facial grimaces and body movements.

The cyclical nature of synagogue music causes the cantor to repeat his renditions of the prayers week after week. As years pass, cantors develop personal patterns of improvisation within the communal tradition. These patterns tend to stabilize with experience, and the most successful become fixed and frozen, thus developing into compositions that are repeated from memory (Idelsohn, 1929/R, pp.296–7; Frigyesi, 1982–3). During the 18th century west European cantors began to write down such compositions for their own use and for their close cantorial friends or relatives (Idelsohn, HoM, vi, 1932/R). Such procedures generated the 'cantorial fantasia' (see §III, 3(iii) below). From the mid-19th century onwards, many cantors learnt their recitatives from cantorial manuals, thus the fixed improvisation of one cantor became the standard chant for the next generation.

(iv) Poetry. Piyyuṭim (Heb. from Gk. poiēsis) are Hebrew liturgical poems used to embellish obligatory prayers and other paraliturgical or religious events, communal and private. In its widest sense the genre encompasses the totality of the Hebrew poetry composed in various forms from the post-biblical period until the early 20th century.

The piyyuṭ first appeared in the land of Israel during the Byzantine period (5th–6th centuries CE) and was initially intended to replace or substitute the set versions of prayers in order to ensure variety, especially on Sabbaths and Festivals. After the 9th century, by which time the set of prayers had become fixed, piyyuṭim were interspersed at certain key points of the liturgical order. Following the Arab conquest of Palestine in 636 CE, the centres of classical piyyuṭ composition moved east, to the major Jewish centres in Mesopotamia, and west, through Byzantine southern Italy in the 9th century to centres in northern Italy, ashkenaz ('Germany'), France and Byzantine Greece – where the central European school of Hebrew sacred poetry developed impressively in the 10th and 11th centuries. The direct continuation of the Eastern school was found in Spain, where from the beginning of the 10th century several generations of outstanding poets (e.g. Solomon Ibn Gabirol, Moshe and Abraham Ibn Ezra, and Yehuda Halevy) flourished in what is known as the 'Golden Age' of Hebrew poetry.

Piyyuṭ creativity declined after the 13th century in most locations, especially when the order of prayers, including post-biblical poetical accretions, was canonized and the inclusion of new texts became unfeasible. However, an impressive output of 'modern' religious poetry in Hebrew (from the 15th century onwards) continued in central Europe, North Africa and the Middle East until the early 20th century. Ex.8, a famous piyyuṭ sung throughout the Diaspora on the qabbalat shabbat ceremony ('welcoming of the Sabbath'), was written by the kabbalist and mystical poet Rabbi Salomon Alkabetz (*c*1505–84). The 'modern' piyyuṭ is considered by critics as having less prestige and artistic inspiration than the classical compositions of the earlier period, with exceptions such as the works of Israel Najara (*c*1555–1625), who lived in Safed (now Zefat, Israel) and Damascus.

Modern poetry was rarely introduced into the normative liturgy after its canonization (with some exceptions, e.g. in Morocco) and therefore is sung only at paraliturgical events (such as the baqqashot sung before dawn on Sabbath mornings in winter, or the zemirot sung at the Sabbath table after the grace) and community occasions (e.g. weddings or bar-mitzvahs). One of the widespread genres of the modern piyyuṭ is the pizmon. This ancient term (transferred to Hebrew from Greek via Aramaic), which originally referred to the refrain of a piyyuṭ, became the generic name for religious songs with or without refrain sung by Sephardi and Middle Eastern Jews.

The genres and forms of the piyyuṭ vary widely according to where and when they were composed. While the early piyyuṭ bears a relationship to biblical poetry and language (e.g. the old seliḥot – penitential poems added to the High Holy Day liturgy), the medieval Hebrew poetry from Spain is closely related to classical Arabic poems in terms of structure (strophic forms and rhyme patterns with or without refrain, particularly of the muwashshaḥ type), metre (quantitative rather than syllabic or phonetic) and even subject matter. This influence from the surrounding culture on Hebrew sacred song is also evident in other locations, for example the Italian Hebrew compositions from the medieval and Renaissance periods (e.g. the adoption of the sonnet form) or in the Turkish piyyuṭ after the 17th century (the adoption of terrenüm – sections of nonsense syllables).

Music and musical performance have been crucial factors in the development of Hebrew liturgical poetry from its earliest periods. Fleischer (1974) proposed that the use of choirs in the early synagogue was related to the introduction of refrains in Hebrew poetry. Avenary (1971–2/R) suggested that the use of the stanza form became highly important in determining musical structure and that the introduction of a clear beat and musical metre to synagogue song may have resulted from the adoption of Arabic poetic models in medieval Spain. Moreover, the term ḥazzan used today for 'synagogue cantor', appears in the early medieval literature as 'singer of piyyuṭim'. Thus musical, as well as poetic, skills seem to have been a major consideration in the qualifications desired of the payṭan (composer of piyyuṭim). The claim that music was only treated as an independent art in the synagogue with the emergence of the piyyuṭ is supported by the fact that by the end of the 9th century, when the liturgical order was more or less finally established, the geonim (leaders of the world Jewry) opposed those ḥazzanim who sung piyyuṭim (Avenary, 1971–2/R, p.589).

The influence of Hebrew sacred poetry on the forms of synagogue music does not disqualify the opposite creative process, that is, the adaptation of new poems to existing musical models. This phenomenon, known in the medieval Christian context as contrafactum is crucial in the singing of the piyyuṭ. The early presence of this practice among Jews provides valuable information about the musical performance of Hebrew sacred poetry in the Middle Ages. From the earliest period of piyyuṭ composition, manuscripts included in the title of the poems the first line of another poem whose melody was used to sing the new text. In Spain and in the post-expulsion Sephardi world (i.e. after 1492–7), these melodic references began with the term of Arabic origin laḥan, while in Italy and ashkenaz the word no'am is more commonly employed: both mean '[sung to the] melody of . . .'. While such citations given in sources dating from before the 13th century and from medieval Spain generally refer to Hebrew religious song, after this period references to secular Arabic songs appear. In later centuries still are found the melodies of secular songs in Spanish, Turkish, Arabic, Greek, Persian and Italian in the Sephardi world, and German and Yiddish in the Ashkenazi world. In post-medieval Hebrew piyyuṭim the poets were not satisfied with merely imitating the form and metre of the secular model but also attempted to reproduce the phonetic sound of the opening line of the foreign song.

The melodies used to sing piyyuṭim in the extant oral traditions cover a wide range of styles. Psalmodic, flexible rhythmic forms (but still strophic, i.e. one phrase being extemporized in constant variations) are considered by some scholars (e.g. Avenary) as remnants of an older style of payṭanut. These forms are found in the Ashkenazi as well as the Sephardi and Middle Eastern communities. However, the source of inspiration for melodies of flexible rhythm in the latter appears to have been Islamic forms such as the Turkish ghazel. Metric melodies, on the other hand, are common. It is important to distinguish between piyyuṭim that have a single traditional melody, for example those for the High Holy Days, and poems sung to a range of different melodies, such as the widespread opening or closing songs of the liturgical services, Adon 'olam, Ein kelohenu or Yiḡdal elohim ḥai. Finally, traditional melodies of piyyuṭim can be used for the performance of non-poetic texts in the liturgy. This phenomenon occurs in the liturgy of the High Holy Days and Festivals, when the seasonal association of a piyyuṭ melody is conveyed through its use with another text. For example, in the Sephardi liturgy for the eve of Rosh Hashanah the opening qaddish is sung to the melody of Aḥot qeṭannah, a traditional medieval piyyuṭ sung only at this time.

3. Ashkenazi.

(i) Historical background. The term 'Ashkenazim' derives from the medieval Hebrew name for Germany (ashkenaz); originally it referred only to the Jews of Germany, but is today used more loosely to denote all Jews of east European descent.

The Ashkenazim trace their ancestry and cultural origins to the Jewish settlements established on the banks of the Rhine during the early Middle Ages. By the end of the 13th century Ashkenazi communities flourished in southern Germany, Austria, Switzerland; northern Italy, northern and central France, the Low Countries and England. Beginning in the 14th century, persecution and expulsion led to the migration of many Jews to northern Germany and Bohemia, and later to Hungary, Poland, Lithuania and Russia. The Ashkenazim who settled in eastern Europe merged with the local Jewish populations and gradually came to dominate them, replacing their religious and liturgical customs with Ashkenazi practices. Yiddish, a modified version of Middle High German, became the vernacular and lingua franca of east European Jewry. By the end of the 15th century two separate, though related, Ashkenazi traditions had evolved: the Western, which continued to be influenced by German culture; and the Eastern, which adopted many Slavic and Ottoman characteristics. Both traditions, however, maintained cultural links with each other through the exchange of rabbinical literature and sacred music. The ties grew stronger during the late 18th century and the 19th when Jews emigrated from eastern Europe to Germany.

In the 19th century Ashkenazi communities were also established in North and South America, South Africa, Australia and Palestine. During World War II most of the European Ashkenazim perished in the Holocaust. Those that survived and re-established communities in eastern Europe were religiously and culturally suppressed by the Communist regimes. However, those who joined the Ashkenazi populations in western Europe, North America, Israel and elsewhere effected profound changes in the character, liturgy and music of their foster communities. As a result of the Holocaust and the demographic changes that ensued, the original German Jewish tradition, the minhağ ashkenaz, and its music have become almost extinct.

As with many other aspects of the Ashkenazi tradition, the early liturgical chants first developed in the Rhineland and then spread throughout Europe; in the east they absorbed and modified various Slavic elements. The migration of chants, however, was not exclusively in one direction. Some songs and melodies originated among the Eastern Ashkenazim and were introduced into the central European communities by itinerant cantors. This trend increased from the second half of the 18th century with the growing demand in Germany for east European ḥazzanim, who were noted for their sweet voices.

(ii) To the 16th century. Evidence for the musical traditions of Ashkenazi communities before the 16th century is scarce and no examples of written musical documentation are extant; all traditional chants and melodies were transmitted orally until the 19th century. The first written sources of Ashkenazi chants appeared in the early 16th century with the publication of notations of the Pentateuch cantillation by non-Jewish German musicians and humanists; for example, Johannes Boeschenstein's musical appendix to Johannes Reuchlin's De accentibus et orthographia linguae Hebraicae (Hagenau, 1518; fig.15) and Sebastian Muenster's notation of the same in his Institutiones grammaticae in Hebraeam linguam (Basle, 1524). The earliest notated documents of Ashkenazi prayer chants date from the second half of the 18th century, when ḥazzanim notated florid recitatives (Adler, 1989). However, some idea about the development of music in the early Ashkenazi synagogue can be gained from an analysis of the old chants as they appear in 19th-century cantorial manuals, the comparative study of extant oral traditions and the references to liturgical customs found in rabbinical texts. Such evidence suggests that the traditional chants of the Ashkenazim consisted of five elements: psalmody and early centonized chants; cantillation of sacred scripture; the mi-sinai melodies; the 'seasonal melodies'; and cantorial improvisations.

Unlike the Middle Eastern and North African communities the Ashkenazim have a limited repertory of psalmodic melodies. Precentors chant some psalmodic formulae for the last verses of each psalm in the pesuqei de-zimra (zemirot) section of the morning service (Gerson-Kiwi, 1967), and rabbis may lead a public recitation of psalms during times of distress with a sad psalmody. Usually, however, Ashkenazi Jews recite their psalms individually and silently. Interestingly, some psalmodic structures are used to chant medieval poetic verses, such as the Akdamut by the 11th-century poet Rabbi Meir ben Isaac Nehorai of Worms, Germany.

The early centonized chants, called nigunim (or alte Weise in Germany and nusaḥ in eastern Europe) are simple combinations of melodic formulae that may be sung by a non-professional precentor known as ba'al tefillah. Most are sung to prose texts, which form the majority of the regular prayers. Often the precentor's chant is limited to the last sentences of the prayer, but this is sufficient to control the modal flow of the prayers and to prompt the congregational heterophonic murmur so typical of Ashkenazi synagogues. The old chants tend to have a narrow ambitus of no more than a 6th or an octave, but within this range motifs of beginning, continuation, partial closure, preconclusion and final cadence can still be clearly distinguished (ex.9). The modality of the chant is not determined by the text itself, but by its function in the liturgy and by the occasion – the type of service, Holy Day and so on. The same text may, therefore, be performed differently at different services or seasons, and chants are recognized by the community as musical symbols of the yearly liturgical cycle.

The Ashkenazim developed cantillation systems for the liturgical reading of the various biblical texts. The systems adhere to the Masoretic accents, ṭe'amei ha-miqra, as they were classified during the 10th century by the Tiberias school of Masoretes. The east European Ashkenazim recognize six musical systems for the cantillation of the Bible: the Torah (i.e. the weekly readings); Pentateuch portions read on the High Holy Days (Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur); hafṭarah – the Prophetic portions read after the Pentateuch on the Sabbath and Holy Days; Esther; Lamentations; and the Song of Songs, Ruth and Ecclesiastes. The Jews of Germany recognized only the first five systems. Although each system is modally unique, some melodic patterns have clearly migrated from one system to the others. Avenary's extensive study (1978) of the development of the Torah cantillation among various Ashkenazi communities from the earliest documentation in the 16th century to the 20th reveals a remarkable trend towards a continuous perfecting of the cantillation system.

The mi-sinai melodies are a group of late medieval tunes and recitatives sung mainly on High Holy Days and revered by ḥazzanim in both eastern and western Europe. In 19th-century writings they were erroneously attributed to the 'Nestor Maharil', that is, Rabbi Jacob Levy Segal Mölin (*c*1365–1427), who exercised a decisive influence over Ashkenazi music and liturgy. In eastern Europe they are known as skarbove nigunim ('melodies of the treasure'). The origins of the current name, which means 'from Mount Sinai', is unclear and various explanations have been suggested (e.g. Polnauer, 1997). The 13th-century Sefer ḥasidim (Book of the Pious) mentions this term, but only in the context of biblical cantillation. It is possible that Idelsohn, who first studied these melodies in depth in the 1920s, adopted the medieval term.

Idelsohn's studies of the mi-sinai melodies (1926; 1929/R; 1933) showed that they were composed between the late 11th century and early 16th. Their style reveals associations with the old Ashkenazi prayer chants and cantillation patterns and with non-Jewish sources, such as Gregorian chant and German Minnesang. Idelsohn's findings were expanded by Eric Werner, who linked the tunes to northern French mourning chants and related their creation to the depressed atmosphere in Jewish communities after the massacres by the Crusaders (1976, pp.26–45). The most famous mi-sinai melody is that for the prayer of Kol nidrei (Aramaic: 'All vows') sung on the eve of Yom Kippur. Its Jewish and German origins have been demonstrated by Idelsohn (1931–2), who dated it to the beginning of the 16th century. Regarded as a musical symbol of Jewish suffering and hope for redemption, this melody was considered most sacred and was therefore highly embellished by cantors. The earliest extant notated version of the melody, in a manuscript (*c*1765) by the ḥazzan Aron Beer (1738–1821), is full of coloratura passages (Idelsohn, 1929/R, pp.154–5). Werner's attempt to reconstruct the original version of Kol nidrei by divesting it of all ornamentations provides the essentials of the melody, but there is no proof that it was ever sung in this form (Werner, 1976, p.36; ex.10). The melody, with embellishments, was also well-known among non-Jewish musicians in the 19th century and has been arranged several times for instrumental performance (e.g. Max Bruch's Kol nidrei for cello and orchestra, 1881).

The 'seasonal melodies' are tunes of certain liturgical or paraliturgical piyyuṭim sung during the three Pilgrimage Festivals (Pesaḥ, Shavu'ot, Sukkot), or at Ḥanukkah, Purim and Tish'ah be-av. Melodies, such as those for the Ḥanukkah anthem Ma'oz ṣur, the Pesaḥ hagadah song Adir hu and the Tish'ah be-av lamentation Eli Zion, were strongly associated with the particular Festivals on which they were sung, and thus each became the musical symbol of its season. Many communities, especially those of the Western Ashkenazim, incorporated the tunes or motifs thereof as 'seasonal Leitmotif's in their services. Werner (1976, pp.89–102) has shown that most of them were adopted from non-Jewish sources. Some became fashionable only from the late 16th century.

Ex.10 Eric Werner's attempted reconstruction of the original Kol nidrei melody (Werner, 1976, p.36)

Although no records of cantorial improvisation exist before the 18th century, cantors have probably always improvised. The long prose texts and the extensive piyyuṭim they had to chant, especially on High Holy Days, could not be performed without at least a limited amount of improvisation. On certain occasions a short prayer would be embellished with 'long melodies' by the ḥazzan while the congregation recited a different text (Idelsohn, 1929/R, p.161). It can be assumed from later practices that even during the Middle Ages, improvisations served to highlight musically the emotional content of the text; they also enhanced the beauty of the services and were a means of musical entertainment. In addition, they frequently contributed to the glorification of the cantor's voice and virtuosity. The improvisation patterns were probably based on the old prayer chants and were delineated by the modal structure of the melodies.

(iii) The 17th and 18th centuries. During the 17th and 18th centuries, various statements appeared in rabbinical literature protesting against several new cantorial practices (Idelsohn, 1925; Werner, 1976, pp.112–17). Most poignant is a series of complaints stated in the anonymous late 17th-century pamphlet Tokhekhah meğulah ('Open Reprimands'). The author laments the cantor's ignorance of rabbinical literature, their unfamiliarity with the prayer book, their bad articulation of Hebrew and mannerisms that made a mockery out of prayer. Among the latter he cites the habits of placing their hands on their jaws, temples or throat while singing, introducing nonsense syllables into the prayers, tearing words apart, extending and embellishing non-texted melodies at the expense of essential prayer texts (which they tend to rush through), introducing many non-Jewish melodies into the services; and singing the most sacred qaddish to potpourris of trite melodies. The amount and nature of these protests indicate that a new style of cantorial singing emerged during this period.

Idelsohn used the term 'ars nova' for the new cantorial style (1929/R, pp.162, 204, 210; no connection with the 14th-century French polyphonic style is intended) and maintained that it developed as a result of contacts with Italian musicians who travelled throughout Germany. The extent of the influence of the European Baroque style on Ashkenazi synagogue music awaits further research, but it is plausible that the tendency among Baroque singers and instrumentalists to adorn melodies with many embellishments re-enforced and enriched the improvisatory art of the Ashkenazi ḥazzanim.

The exact nature of the new style in its inception is not clear. Judging from current Orthodox cantorial practice, it can be assumed that much of the improvisation was based on embellishing the old nusaḥ tunes by adding melodic tropes to existing centonized melodies, and that the additional melodic segments were sung without words or to nonsense syllables. Patterns and larger segments of successful improvisations were probably repeated, then memorized and disseminated to other cantors. From the rabbinical complaints it is clear that the new pieces included fashionable tunes of secular, often non-Jewish, sources.

Evidence of the later phase of the new style derives from manuscripts of cantorial music, which first appeared in the mid-18th century; the earliest extant is the 1744 compendium by the ḥazzan Juda Elias of Hanover. Most important are the manuscripts of the Berlin ḥazzan Aron

Beer (1738–1821), which include the oldest surviving notation of Kol nidrei and over 1200 other pieces by various ḥazzanim of the time (Adler, 1989; Idelsohn, HoM, vi, 1932/R); other sources are descriptions of Jewish customs by non-Jews, for example, Johann Jakob Schudt's Jüdische Merckwürdigkeiten (Frankfurt and Leipzig, 1714–18).

Four features may be mentioned as typical of this phase in the development of Western Ashkenazi synagogue music: the emergence of the 'cantorial fantasia'; the introduction of fashionable Rococo tunes into synagogue worship; the extensive use of meshorerim (vocal accompanists to the ḥazzan); and the attempt to introduce instrumental music.

The 'cantorial fantasia' (Avenary, 1968) is a peculiar enlargement of the mi-sinai melodies. A typical fantasia begins with a long, textless introduction with Baroque melodic sequences, broken chords and the like; it continues by alternating texted segments of the mi-sinai melody with vocal textless interpolations. The range of the cantor's line is often wide and may exceed two octaves, but the melody is often divided between the ḥazzan and his assistants. An example is the setting of 'Aleinu leshabbeaḥ for the High Holy Days by Joseph Goldstein (*c*1795; ed. Idelsohn, HoM, vi, 1932/R, no.21; ex.11).

Performing the fantasias and other genres, the ḥazzanim were accompanied by meshorerim ('singers') who often served as their apprentices. Usually a ḥazzan would be helped by a young boy (Yiddish zinger'l) and a bass-singer, but in some larger communities the meshorerim group consisted of a small ensemble of men and boys. Literary descriptions of the singing of the ḥazzan-bass-zinger'l trio, as well as various indications in the cantorial manuscripts, suggest a distinct style that included drone accompaniments, short responses, typical solos for bass and treble, and parallel motion in 3rds or 6ths between two of the singers. The group often imitated musical instruments and occasionally enhanced their appearance with facial grimaces and hand motions. A thorough reconstruction of their style still awaits research (for an attempt, see Katz, 1995). After the Emancipation, the trio gradually disappeared and synagogue choirs replaced the meshorerim. In eastern Europe, the old style lingered on to the end of the 19th century and some remnants of it may still be heard in synagogue choirs of east European origin.

Another important development was the introduction of fashionable secular tunes in imitation of Rococo instrumental music. The cantorial manuscripts abound in minuets, sicilianas, Waldhorns (horn signals and fanfares), 'Margos' (perhaps marches) and other popular tunes, mostly in binary form. Usually written without text, they were intended to be sung to the rhymes of piyyuṭim, such as Lekha dodi on Friday night or Melekh 'elyon at Rosh Hashanah (ex.12). They also served as introductions to prayers and were sung to nonsense syllables.

During the 18th century, attempts were made to introduce musical instruments into some Ashkenazi synagogues. Under the influence of the mystical teachings of the Kabbalah, synagogues in Prague and south Germany celebrated the welcoming of the Sabbath with instrumental music on Friday afternoons until sundown. For this purpose they even introduced organs into the synagogue, long before the reforms of the 19th century.

Ex.11 Excerpt from Joseph Goldstein: 'Aleinu leshabbeaḥ (Idelsohn, HoM, vi/2, no.21)

['It is our duty to praise the Lord of all; to ascribe greatness to him who created the world in the beginning. For he did not make us as the nations of other lands, and has not placed us as other families of the earth.']

This short-lived practice ended in about 1793 (Ellenson, 1995).

The east European Ashkenazim did not usually share the development in the central European style. Jews in Poland, Russian and the Baltic countries were less interested in songs of praise and more in supplication-recitatives that would express their plight and allow them to explore the emotional delights of Slavic-influenced modality. They preferred ḥazzanim with sweet tenor or high lyric-baritone voices and with fast, florid coloratura. The model ḥazzan could express the emotional meaning of the prayers through clever use of modal patterns (Yiddish zogekhts) and move the congregation to tears. Hence their predilection for supplicatory or penitential texts. The earliest records of this style seem to be the early 19th-century notations by Hirsch Weintraub (1811–82) of the highly ornate recitatives of his father, Solomon Kashtan (1781–1829; ex.13).

Like their Western counterparts, the Eastern ḥazzanim were often accompanied by meshorerim, and many made their livelihood by wandering with their choristers from one shtetl (Jewish village) to another. Towards the end of the 18th century, east European ḥazzanim emigrated to central Europe and exerted some influence over the musical style of the Western Ashkenazi synagogues.

From the second half of the 18th century, east European liturgical and paraliturgical music was enriched by the ḥasidim. The ḥasidic movement was founded by the Ba'al Shem Tov (Rabbi Israel ben Eliezor, 1698–1760), who sought to bring personal and communal salvation to the Jews by worshipping God and performing His commandments with joy and enthusiasm. Music and dance were two of the most important means for achieving the right state of mind for proper worship and therefore the leaders of the ḥasidic movement encouraged musical creativity and allowed the introduction of new tunes to selected prayers. Some of the leaders served as precentors in their synagogues and various ḥasidic melodies are attributed to them.

On the basis of the kabbalistic mysticism, the ḥasidim believed that all music emerged from a divine source and was originally sacred, yet much of the music in the world was defiled through improper use, either by setting it to profane words or by performing it in unholy places and impious circumstances. It was the duty of the pious ḥasid to redeem melodies from their defilement by using them in holiness. Therefore the ḥasidim borrowed melodies from secular and non-Jewish sources and incorporated them in their sacred services and ceremonies. Thus, the east European Jewish musical heritage was enriched with Polish mazurkas, Russian kozatchocks, Ukrainian and Romanian shepherd songs and various marches and waltzes. All the new melodic acquisitions underwent subtle modifications to adapt them to ḥasidic culture. The ḥasidim were often criticized for their eclecticism and sometimes for their bad taste, but for them salvation overrode aesthetics.

During the 19th century, ḥasidic leaders (Yiddish rebbes or tsadíkim) established courts and the ḥasidim flocked there to receive the blessing and advice of the rebbe. These courts soon became centres of musical activity and creation. Some of the rebbes were gifted musicians and composed melodies for their disciples, others maintained menagenim (court musicians) who composed the melodies on behalf of the leaders. New tunes were created for every Holy Day and were considered important spiritual messages. The melodies were not written, but transmitted orally from the rebbe's court to the ḥasidim in their various towns and villages.

While some tunes were used during synagogue services, most of them were sung at ḥasidic paraliturgical functions, mainly at the communal gatherings around the rebbe's table – the tish. Some of the tunes were settings of prayers and biblical verses, others had words in Yiddish, Ukrainian or other east European languages, but most of the tunes were sung to nonsense syllables such as 'ya-ba-bam', 'tiri-rai-dai-da' and the like. The ḥasidim amassed an enormous repertory of borrowed and newly composed melodies in a great variety of genres and styles that have yet to be classified. These range from simple dance tunes (Yiddish hopkelekh) of one phrase repeated endlessly, to complex melodies with many sections. Most important are the slow tunes known in Yiddish as nigunei dvéikus (Heb. devequt), whose purpose is to raise the soul to its divine source (ex.14).

The ḥasidic movement, which still flourishes in Israel, the USA and elsewhere, preserves its original musical tradition albeit with modifications. Many famous cantors in eastern Europe and elsewhere came from ḥasidic families and incorporated ḥasidic tunes into their liturgical improvisations and compositions.

Cantorial improvisations both East and West, as well as original ḥasidic melodies, are based on modes known as shteyger (Yiddish, from Ger. 'Steiger') or gust. While the Western ḥazzanim utilized the modes based on natural minor or Mixolydian scales, the Eastern ḥazzanim preferred those with scales that had the interval of the augmented 2nd. Despite various endeavours to describe some of the shteygers, a comprehensive theory of the Ashkenazi synagogue modes is still lacking. Attempts to discuss the modes were first made during the second half of the 19th century, among the most important is Josef Singer's essay Die Tonarten des traditionellen Synagogengesang (Vienna, 1886), which tried to relate the scales of the cantorial modes to those of the church modes. This approach, considered a breakthrough at its time, was severely criticized by Idelsohn for neglecting the Eastern aspects of the shteyger, namely its motivic and functional components. Idelsohn and later musicologists tried to discuss the modes in a manner similar to the description of the Arabic maqāmāt, taking into consideration the salient motifs, partial and final cadences, recitation tones, the liturgical functions and even the ethos of the mode (e.g. Idelsohn, 1939; Cohon, 1950; Avenary, 1971–2; and Levine, 1980, and 1989. Avenary, 1971 raises questions about the ethos aspect of the modes.)

Theoretical discussions usually describe three main modes and a few subsidiary ones, all named after the initial words of relevant prayers. The principal shteygers are maġen avot, adonai malakh (or adoshem malakh) and ahavah rabbah (ex.15). The simplest (and the oldest, according to Idelsohn, 1933) is maḡen avot, which is based on a natural minor scale, sometimes with a lower (Phrygian) 2nd at the cadences. The mode is said to reflect the peaceful atmosphere of the Friday night evening service. More complicated is adonai malakh, which assumed different structures in the Eastern and the Western traditions. In its fullest Eastern form it is based on a peculiar scale built on a series of conjunct equal tetrachords of 1–1–1/2 tones. Cantors regard it as representing glory and majesty and they frequently blend it with the European major scale. The most complex of the three is ahavah rabbah. Used mainly by Eastern ḥazzanim, it is said to be an excellent means of expressing agitated emotions, both joyful and sad. Its most developed form is built on what might be described as an modified Phrygian scale with an augmented 2nd between the second and third degrees. The sixth degree below the tonic is always raised. Frequent excursions are made through the fourth degree (which serves as a temporary tonic) to the minor, adonai malakh and major modes; a further excursion is sometimes made to the relative major of the minor mode (Laki-Frigyesi, 1982–3).

The most frequently described subsidiary modes are the yishtabbaḥ shteyger, which is based on a natural minor scale similar to maḡen avot but with different motifs and with excursions on the fourth degree similar to those in the ahavah rabbah mode; and the mi shebberakh (or av haraḥamim) shteyger, which is based on the so-called Ukrainian-Dorian scale, that is, the Dorian scale with a raised 4th degree (Idelsohn, 1929/R, pp.184–92). Digressions to this shteyger serve to enrich the other modes.

(iv) Post-Emancipation. The Emancipation of European Jews induced in them an urge to be integrated into the surrounding culture. The relative sense of freedom encouraged new trends of thinking influenced by the 18th-century ideology of Enlightenment, especially as presented by its most important Jewish proponent, the philosopher Moses Mendelssohn (1729–86). Together, the social and ideological changes effected considerable modifications of the Ashkenazi synagogue practices and caused major changes in the liturgical music of the Jews in central and western Europe. Some of the innovations established in German-speaking countries and in France were emulated later in eastern Europe.

One of the most important manifestations of the new trends was the rise of the Reform Movement in Germany during the early decades of the 19th century. The early Reformers, such as Israel Jacobson (1728–1828) in Seesen (Westphalia) and David Friedländer (1750–1834) in Berlin, changed the traditional siddur (prayerbook) by abolishing texts that seemed to them controversial and by substituting new prayers in German for the old ones in Hebrew. They made considerable alterations in the customs and ceremonies of the service. Above all, they introduced the organ into the synagogue and reduced the role of the traditional ḥazzan. The main musical innovation was the congregational singing of chorales in Hebrew or German with organ accompaniment, mostly to melodies adopted from the Protestant Church. The traditional chanting of the scriptures according to the ṭe'amim was abolished and the weekly portions from the Pentateuch and the books of the Prophets were merely declaimed. The model taken for many Reform synagogues was the Ex.15 Scales and motifs of Ashkenazi shtaygers:

Hamburg Temple, which was dedicated in 1818. However, the attempt made there to combine the modern innovations of Berlin with some of the oldest melodies of the Sephardi rite – as introduced by the Portuguese ḥazzan David Meldola (1780–1861) – failed.

The innovations of the Reform temples (as Reform synagogues were often known) aroused bitter controversy among rabbis and scholars. A collection of rabbinical responsa, Nogah ha-ṣedeq (1818), in favour of the new practices triggered the publication of a vast polemic literature that dealt among other things with musical issues, especially the use of the organ in the synagogue.

19th-century Emancipation also helped change the musical practices of the traditional synagogue. The modern quest for aesthetics and decorum was manifest in the new synagogal regulations (Synagogenorderungen) issued by various communities and encouraged by the state. The bylaws discouraged and sometimes forbade old musical practices, especially those that developed during the 17th and 18th centuries. Of special importance was the disappearance of the meshorerim (see §3(iii) above) and their gradual replacement by the modern choir. With the decrease in the meshorerim practice, training ḥazzanim through apprenticeship was replaced by regulated study in teachers' seminaries, which were supervised by the state. Many cantorial students learnt their chants from notated music rather than from oral tradition. To meet the growing demand for written chants, several manuals of cantorial recitatives appeared in print (e.g. Moritz Deutsch's Vorbeterschule, Breslau, 1871). This and a growing distaste for the old flamboyant embellishments caused a major revision in cantorial recitative style. The recitatives were simplified or 'purified' and were frequently written and executed in common time.

Various attempts were made to establish services that would stand in mid-stream between the Reform and Orthodox practices. The most influential of the so-called Moderate Reform synagogues was the Seitenstettengasse Temple in Vienna (dedicated 1826). Under the guidance of Rabbi Isaac Noa Mannheimer (1793–1865) its liturgical practices were for the most part strictly traditional. The innovations were the long weekly sermons in German and the new liturgical music introduced by Salomon Sulzer (1804–90). In addition to the 'purified chants' and recitatives that he edited, Sulzer sang new compositions for ḥazzan and an a cappella four-part choir of boys and men in a Classical style. The choral compositions, which were sung in Hebrew, were composed by Sulzer himself, or commissioned from other composers, Jewish and non-Jewish, such as Joseph Fischhoff (1804–57) and Ignaz von Seyfried (1776–1841). Even Schubert contributed to a Hebrew composition – a setting of Psalm xcii (D 942).

The Vienna Temple soon became the focus for the ḥazzanim of Central and eastern Europe and its influence was further enhanced after 1838 when Sulzer published the first volume of his Schir Zion, containing selected compositions of the Vienna Temple music (the second appeared in 1865). Synagogues following Sulzer's model sprang up first in the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and later in Germany.

A similar attempt to combine a traditional service with contemporary music was made by Samuel Naumbourg (1815–80) in Paris. With the encouragement of the French government, he proceeded to reshape the music of the Paris synagogue, aiming to create a model for all the French Jewish communities, which were united under the governmental system of Consistoires israélites. Naumbourg's Zemiroth Yisrael (1847–64), which contains compositions for ḥazzan and male choir, consists of traditional chants and recitatives in the south-German style and modern compositions influenced by French grand opéra choruses. Naumbourg's influence spread far and wide in France and its colonies.

The innovations of Sulzer and Naumbourg served as examples to English ḥazzanim, who developed similar repertories of synagogal choral music. The London school was created by Simon Asher (1841–79) and his disciple Israel Lazarus Mombach (1813–80), and reached its peak with the works of Marcus Hast (1871–1911). The music of the modern Ashkenazi synagogues of London was sung in similar houses of worship throughout the British Empire.

During the 1870s, the musical centre of the Moderate Reform Movement shifted to Berlin. The great synagogue on Oranjenburgerstrasse (dedicated 1866), which possessed excellent ḥazzanim, a large boys' and men's choir and large organ, was the haven for the music of Louis Lewandowski (1821–94), who served as its choirmaster and music director. Lewandowski, perhaps the most gifted composer of Ashkenazi liturgical music in the 19th century, introduced the Romantic, Mendelssohnian style into the synagogue. His two publications, Kol rinnah u't'fillah (1871, a ḥazzanic manual with compositions for two-part choir) and Todah w'simrah (1876–82, compositions for ḥazzan and choir with optional organ accompaniment) became the main source of musical repertory for Moderate Reform synagogues. Many of his compositions were also sung in Reform and Orthodox synagogues.

In the major cities of eastern Europe, a modern type of chor-shul (Yiddish: 'choral-synagogue') was established, in which fashionable music by Sulzer, Naumbourg and Lewandowski was sung together with the old, flamboyant east European cantorial recitatives. Such east European composers as Nissan Blumenthal (1805–1903), David Nowakowsky (1848–1921) in Odessa and Eliezer Gerovitsch (1844–1913) in Rostov on the Don, strove to find a musical idiom that would combine the German harmony and counterpoint with the east European modality and idiomatic embellishments. Their compositions tended to be long, with many textual repetitions and were usually intended to display the virtuosity of the ḥazzan.

In the USA, the first Reform congregations, such as the Reform Society of Israelites in Charleston (established 1824) or Temple Har Sinai in Baltimore (1842), adopted the practices of the Hamburg Reform Temple and adapted them to the needs of the American community. American Reform temples usually abolished the office of ḥazzan; the music was led by the organist and performed by a mixed choir and occasional soloists. Students of Sulzer, such as Jacob Fraenkel (1807–87) and Morriz Goldstein (1840–1906), served the Moderate Reform synagogues and exerted a lasting influence on American synagogue music of all denominations. Fraenkel and Goldstein's collection of liturgical music, Zimrat yah (1871–86) was disseminated and used widely. Typical of the American style of post-Emancipation music are the works of Sigmund Schlessinger, who was born in Uhlen (Württemberg) in 1835, and emigrated to Mobile, Alabama, in 1860, where he died in 1906. His compositions, which were most popular in American Reform congregations at the beginning of the 20th century, are settings of the American Reform Hebrew Union Prayerbook in the Germanic Romantic style, with some adaptation from Italian opera.

4. SEPHARDI.

(i) Introduction. Sephardi Jews (from Heb. sepharad: 'Spain') are the descendants of the Jews of the Iberian Peninsula, most of whom were expelled from Spain and Portugal during the period 1492–7 or converted to Christianity (since the 14th century) and remained in the Peninsula as crypto-Jews. Those who left Spain after the expulsion settled in North Africa, the Ottoman Empire, and later in western Europe and the Americas. This geographical distribution led, from the musical point of view, to the consolidation of several liturgical sub-traditions: the 'North African' (also known as the 'Maghribi': Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia), the 'Ottoman' (Turkey, Syria, Palestine, Greece, Bosnia, Serbia, Romania, Bulgaria), the 'Italian' (with traces found also in Libya) and the 'Western' (south-west France, Amsterdam, London, Paris, Hamburg, East Coast of the USA and the Caribbean).

All Sephardi communities follow the same liturgical order with the minor exception of liturgical hymns (piyyuṭim), which are added to the normative prayers on Holy Days and special occasions and vary between communities. The musical performance of the liturgy is entirely vocal (in unison or heterophonic texture) and characterized by the interaction between a cantor and an active, participating congregation. Responsorial singing is found in the ancient seliḥot service of the High Holy Days and in the singing of piyyuṭim. The whole congregation sings other sections.

Any learned individual may lead a service. However, one or more permanent ḥazzanim (cantors) serve in each synagogue. Cantors are ordinary members of the community (no ordination is needed) who possess developed singing skills and a knowledge of the liturgical music repertory. Their role is to lead the liturgy, especially on Sabbaths and Holy Days, and within a single service the leading role may pass from one cantor to another. Professional, paid cantors are rare in Sephardi communities, although among west European Sephardim the cantor has held a particularly prominent position, second only to that of the rabbi. In North Africa, a semi-professional singer (payṭan) may also participate in festive services, for example when a wedding or bar-mitzvah is celebrated in the synagogue. He sings special hymns or musically elaborated sections of the liturgy.

Within a single daily or festive Sephardi service, several musical genres are performed, namely, psalmody, cantillation, recitative and strophic melodies. The psalmody is characterized by a repeated musical phrase of narrow range (usually a perfect 5th) and clear pulse (but without fixed metre) that is divided into two hemistiches, each ending on a clear cadence. The setting of the text is mostly syllabic. This genre can be heard in the congregational singing of psalms at the opening of the morning services (see §III, 2(i) above). Cantillation, as in all Jewish communities, is the public reading of the Torah and other biblical texts on Sabbaths and Holy Days according to the Masoretic accents. Despite similarities in the musical realization of the accents in all Sephardi communities, regional styles exist in this genre also, with the greatest distinction lying between the 'Eastern Sephardi' and the 'North African' cantillations (see above, §III, 2(ii)). Improvised recitatives in flowing rhythm are used to perform most liturgical texts. Recitatives range from enhanced, syllabic readings of narrow range to developed, melismatic performances of wide range whose pitch organization is framed by modes, especially Arabic maqāmāt or Turkish makamlar. Strophic melodies consist of two or more musical phrases repeated in a fixed order, with or without refrain, and usually with a fixed metre. These melodies serve for the singing of liturgical poems and, occasionally, of selected texts in prose. Strophic melodies may be traditional or adopted from the music of the surrounding culture.

As in all Jewish communities, the liturgical music of the Sephardi Jews is an open system. This concept implies the constant tension between community, tradition and individual innovation in the development of the repertory. Despite commonalities in the liturgical music and its performance in Sephardi congregations over wide geographical areas (the most outstanding example being the musical repertory for the High Holy Days), each synagogue functions as a musical microcosm. An important factor in the merging of continuity with change is the mobility of cantors, who spread and blend melodies from one location to another during their journeys around the Mediterranean.

Paraliturgical events are a crucial component of the Sephardi musical tradition. The singing of baqqashot (see §III, 1 and 2(iv) below) is the most developed of these rituals and is found in the Ottoman, Moroccan and Syrian sub-traditions.

(ii) Iberian roots. The source of the Iberian Jewish culture from the time of the Arab conquest of Spain (late 7th century onwards) is found in the older Eastern Jewish centres, especially the caliphate capital of Baghdad. The musical lore of the Eastern Jews, which already included the concepts of melodic modes, rhythmic modes or cycles, and musical affects (e.g. the writings by Sa'adyah Gaon, 888–942, in Adler, 1975, nos.600–630), were probably introduced into Spain with the Arab invasion. However, as early as the 10th century, a distinctive Andalusian Jewish heritage had emerged. The close Arabic–Jewish interaction led to the development of a courtly Jewish culture that included, among other features, the creation of a new Hebrew poetry (sacred and secular) based on Arabic models and techniques, such as the use of quantitative metres and innovative strophic forms (e.g. the muwashshaḥ). Poetic metre and strophic forms exposed the Jews to new musical forms that permeated the synagogue. Another phenomenon of Arabic origin already found in early manuscripts of sacred Hebrew poetry from Spain is the substantial use of contrafacta. From the scant information about music in the Iberian synagogues before 1492 it is clear that developed musical skills and congregational singing were established features by the 11th century. These traits are testified in rabbinical responsa in which the preference for cantors with skilled voices is admitted. The complaint against local cantors by Rabbi Asher ben Yehiel from Germany (*c*1250–1327), who was exiled in Castille, reveals that by the end of the 13th century the musicality of Castillian cantors overruled their religious piety (She'elot u-teshuvot, Jerusalem, 1965, iv, p.22). The non-centralized character of Iberian Jewry presupposes the existence of regional styles of synagogue music (Andalusian, Aragonese, Castillian, Catalonian etc.). The foundation of synagogues in Salonika (Thessaloniki) and Constantinople after 1492 on the basis of the regional Iberian origins of their congregations appears to corroborate this assumption. However, the existence of melodies from the Iberian period common to all Sephardi communities, especially for the High Holy Days, cannot be ruled out (Avenary, 1986).

(iii) North Africa (Maghribi). Although Spanish Jews settled in North Africa before their final expulsion from the Iberian Peninsula, in its aftermath they established communities in the major urban centres of Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and to a lesser extent Libya. Two layers of music may be detected in the Maghribi liturgy: autochthonous and Eastern Sephardi. The first layer is based on the classical Andalusian musical traditions of North Africa (Arabic al-'ālā al-andalusiyya in Morocco; gharnāṭī in Algeria; ma'lūf in Tunisia). It is characterized by a particular quality of vocal emission, the use of the Andalusian modes (which have a distinctive pentatonic ground structure) and syncopated rhythmic patterns. The singing of psalms to measured non-metrical melodies is also an ancient hallmark of this tradition, which was later disseminated widely by Moroccan cantors among the west European Sephardi communities (see above, §III, 2(i), ex.2). The Eastern Sephardi layer is reflected in the use of liturgical melodies from Turkey and Palestine that were brought by emissaries (shaddarim) who visited North Africa from the 18th century onwards to raise funds for the Holy Land. The Eastern Sephardi influence is found particularly in some piyyuṭ melodies from the High Holy Day repertory.

The most elaborate paraliturgical tradition among Moroccan Jews is the performance of the baqqashot ('petitions'). This event, held early on Sabbath mornings during winter, combined kabbalistic rituals such as tiqqun ḥaṣot with the performance of a set of sacred poems according to the modes and genres of the Andalusian court music of Morocco. Several traditions of baqqashot developed in different cities, but eventually that of the southern cities of Marrakech and Essaouira, codified in the book Shir yedidut (Marrakech, 1921), prevailed. It was adopted by several synagogues in Casablanca where large numbers of Jews from different parts of Morocco gathered from the early 20th century.

(iv) Ottoman Empire. Despite their diversity, the Sephardi synagogues throughout the Ottoman Empire shared a unified musical repertory. The major musical contribution of this branch has been the adoption of the Turkish and Arabic modal systems (makamlar/maqāmāt; see MODE, §V, 2) as a vehicle to unify the music of an entire synagogue service or of a section of it. Early evidence for this phenomenon is found in the work of Israel Najara (*c*1555–1625). A descendant of Jewish emigrants from Spain who settled in the Galilee, Najara, an outstanding poet and composer, became a master of the incipient Ottoman makam system and arranged his two major collections of Hebrew sacred poetry (Zemirot yisrael, Safed, 1587; Salonika, 1599; Venice, 1600; and She'erit yisrael, unpublished) according to these musical modes. However, the practice of using modes in the liturgy was established only during the 17th century, when the involvement of Sephardi Jews in the music traditions of the surrounding culture reached a high point. The manuscript of religious poems belonging to Moshe ben Michael Hacohen from Salonika (1644–1730), cantor at the Levantine synagogue in Venice, includes an index of the Turkish modes, indicating which should be used for each festival and the names of the melodies for each section of the service (GB-Lbl Add.26967, dated 1702).

The proficiency of the Ottoman Sephardi cantor in the makam system is a hallmark of his art. Modal improvisation in flexible rhythm is applied to various sections of the service sung by the cantor as soloist (e.g. the yoṣer section of the Sabbath morning service). Modulations are expected from gifted cantors. Metric melodies intermingled with the improvised sections are based on the same modes; sometimes these melodies are adopted from popular Arabic or Turkish songs. In addition to these adopted metric melodies, the repertory includes traditional metric melodies for the poetic insertions (piyyuṭim) performed during the High Holy Day liturgy, and for dirges sung on Tish'ah be-av: such melodies are considered to date from the oldest layers of the Eastern Sephardi repertory.

The old Ottoman style of liturgical singing still persists in small concentrations of Turkish Jews in Israel, Turkey, France and the USA. However, it has largely been superseded by the 'Jerusalem-Sephardi' style (see §III, 11(i) below). Ex.16 is the mystical poem 'El mistater beshafrir ḥevyon' by Abraham Maimin (fl 17th century) as sung by the Jews of Aleppo (Syria); it is still performed today as an opening to the singing of baqqashot in the Jersusalem-Sephardi style.

The singing of piyyuṭim in paraliturgical vigils developed in Turkey following the model set by Rabbi Israel Najara in the late 16th century (Seroussi, 'Rabbi Yisrael Najara', 1990). Since the beginning of the 17th century and until the 20th, Jewish poets and composers in Turkey and Greece produced a large repertory of sacred songs based on the Turkish makam system and set to instrumental and vocal musical genres of the Ottoman courtly music, such as peşrev, kar, beste and şarki (see OTTOMAN MUSIC). Thousands of such poems are preserved in manuscript. The centres of these musical activities were the cities of Adrianople, Istanbul and Salonika. Many Jewish composers and performers, such as Aharon Hamon ('Yahudi Harun', d after 1721), Moshe Faro ('Musi', d after 1776) and Isaac Fresco Romano ('Tanburi Izak', 1745–1814) served in the Ottoman court and attained considerable prestige. The printed compendium Shirei yisrael be-ereṣ ha-qedem (Istanbul, 1921) preserves the texts of this repertory as it was performed at the beginning of the 20th century.

(v) Western Europe and the Americas. Jews forced to convert to Christianity in Spain and Portugal began to leave the Iberian Peninsula towards the end of the 16th century to establish new communities, which are usually called 'Portuguese' or 'Spanish-Portuguese'. They settled in Venice, Amsterdam and south-west France (Bayonne, Bordeaux) and later expanded to other centres in Europe (Paris, London, Hamburg, Livorno, Gibraltar, Vienna) and the Americas (New York, Philadelphia, Rhode Island, Charleston, Savannah, Curaçao etc.). The foundations of their liturgical tradition may be traced back to the 'mother' community of Amsterdam. This repertory is based on the North African and Ottoman Sephardi practices (the first cantors of Amsterdam were 'imported' from these non-European centres) combined with the creations of local cantors (who were expected to read music notation and perform Western art music). Among the earliest Sephardi cantors in Amsterdam were Joseph Shalom Gallego from Salonika (officiated *c*1614–28) and Rabbi Isaac Uziel from Fez, Morocco.

The engagement of cantors from Amsterdam in the 'sister' communities contributed to the relative uniformity of their liturgical repertories. In the course of time, as the demographic composition of these synagogues changed, more local traditions emerged. Thus, the liturgical music tradition of the Spanish-Portuguese synagogue of Bevis Marks in London, preserved in the collection by Emanuel Aguilar and David A. de Sola (The Ancient Melodies of the Liturgy of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews, London, 1857), shows North African influences resulting from the engagement of cantors from Morocco and Gibraltar. On the other hand, the repertory of the Spanish-Portuguese Synagogue of New York City includes liturgical compositions by 19th-century German Jewish composers following the contingent of German Jews who joined this congregation.

Original liturgical compositions by cantors from Amsterdam and other Western Sephardi communities (London, Hamburg, Bayonne) are preserved in manuscripts and printed anthologies (Adler, 1989). After the opening of the impressive new synagogue in Amsterdam in 1675, both Jewish and non-Jewish composers were commissioned to write original works in Hebrew with instrumental accompaniment for religious festivals, usually cantatas in the Italian style of the 18th century (Adler, 1966). Among the most distinguished composers serving the Amsterdam community were C.J. Lidarti (1730–after 1793) and Abraham Caceres (fl Amsterdam, 1718–38). Melodies from these elaborated musical compositions from more than two centuries ago survived as monophonic liturgical melodies in the oral tradition (Adler, 1984). Another sign of the influence of art music on the Western Sephardi synagogues is the use of trained choirs in the services, a phenomenon that appeared for the first time in the 1820s in Bayonne, then in London (1830s) and Amsterdam (1875).

(vi) Italy. The Sephardi communities in Italy are a special development within the Western diaspora. The oldest Sephardi community in Italy was established in Venice during the 16th century. The five melodies from the Venetian Sephardi tradition notated by Benedetto Marcello in his Estro poetico-armonico (1722–3) already testify to the influence of Eastern Sephardi traditions on the original Spanish-Portuguese layer. In the 18th century, the Sephardi centre in Italy moved from Venice to Livorno. Established by Portuguese Jewish conversos, this community rose into prominence among Sephardi Jews, attracting members from other communities around the Mediterranean rim; ex.17 shows a piyyuṭ ('Akh zeh hayom qiviti') for Purim sung according to this Portuguese tradition.

The great synagogue in Livorno became a centre for musical activities in which choral music by Jewish composers was customarily performed by a trained ensemble; the antecedents of this practice lay in 17th-century Venice, Mantua and Ferrara in the work of Salamone Rossi (Harrán, 1987; 1989; 1999). Manuscripts of original choral music for three voices dating from the 19th century have survived. Psalms and pizmonim (Holy Day songs) comprise the majority of these choral settings. Michele Bolaffi (1768–1842) was the most distinguished Jewish composer active in Livorno during the first part of the 19th century. The use of organ accompaniment in Italian Sephardi synagogues is attested in rabbinical sources (Benayahu, 1987).

5. YEMEN. Precisely when Jews first began to settle in Yemen is not known, although evidence from a few historical findings shows that they had arrived there by the 4th century BCE. Today, however, only a few hundred Yemenite Jews remain in the north of the country; most of the population now lives in Israel, following a series of organized emigrations, beginning with a few hundred families in 1881–2 and culminating in the mass emigration of about 50,000 people in 1949–50 immediately after the founding of the State of Israel. A small community has also been established in the USA. This article concentrates on the liturgical music of the Yemenite community as it now exists in Israel.

Although throughout their history Yemenite Jews maintained contact with the various leaders of the different Jewish centres around the world, in many respects their culture differs markedly from the other traditions. Its unique character seems to preserve some particularly ancient features, especially regarding the performance of the liturgy. Even in the modern society of Israel, where acculturation is a continuing process, the Yemenite Jews tend to live together and to form homogeneous communities, especially around their synagogues, where they go to considerable lengths to retain their distinct traditions.

The Yemenite liturgy is almost identical in its text and general form to most other Orthodox traditions, however, its unique character is revealed in three principal ways. (1) The Yemenite pronunciation of Hebrew and Aramaic texts clearly differentiates almost all the consonants and vowels; traditional pronunciations by other Jewish communities often pronounce several vowels or consonants in the same way. (2) The social and liturgical roles of the congregation and cantor are unlike those usually seen in the other Jewish traditions, with the former assuming a much broader role in its interaction with the cantor (especially in the Sabbath morning service). (3) The structure of the musical items, which arises from the liturgical function of each chant, is of a different character from the other traditions, reflecting the respective roles of congregation and cantor.

The chief characteristics of Yemenite liturgical music can be explained by an analysis of the Sabbath morning service. The first part, pasuge dhazimråh (pesuqei dezimra), includes 22 biblical chapters – 18 from the Psalms, three from the books of Chronicles and Nehemiah, and the Song of the Sea (Exodus xv). Verses from the first three texts are sung by the congregation to a tune with a non-measured rhythm that is repeated for every verse. The singing is extremely heterophonic, as every individual feels free to sing at his own tempo using occasional ornaments and melismas while preserving the 'kernel' of the melody (i.e. the basic group of pitches organized into fixed melodic contours). However, for the Song of the Sea the character of the singing changes abruptly. The text is sung to a new melody, which is measured and consists mostly of two rhythmic values, the short being used for the non-stressed syllables and the long for the stressed. This tune is sung slowly and loudly by the whole congregation in complete unity, creating a 'pluri-vocal' effect that results from the gradual transposition of the melody by individuals who decide to lower the pitch by one tone or to raise it by a 5th and thereby cause the singers nearby to follow them. This produces the effect of a series of 'chords' built on the intervals of a 2nd or a 4th, as is shown in ex.18.

The second part of the service, shama' yisrå'el (shema' yisrael: Deuteronomy vi.5–9 and 41, xi.13–23; and Numbers xv.37–41), consists of three biblical chapters surrounded by four extensive post-biblical benedictions. The singing is performed in solo cantorial style using the

Ex.18 'Song of the Sea' (Exodus xv), verses 5–8, as performed by Yemenite Jews

['The floods cover them; they went down into the depths like a stone. Thy right hand, O Lord, glorious in power, thy right hand, O Lord, shatters the enemy. In the greatness of thy majesty thou overthrowest thy adversaries; thou sendest forth thy fury, it consumes them like stubble. At the blast of thy nostrils the waters piled up, the floods stood up in a heap; the deeps congealed in the heart of the sea.'] first tune from the opening part of the service and stressing its non-measured rhythm by the use of frequent melismas. Only the initial biblical chapter, is sung by the congregation, slowly and loudly according to another syllabic tune. As in the first part, the importance of this text is further emphasized by the manner of performance, which differs markedly from that of the surrounding musical items.

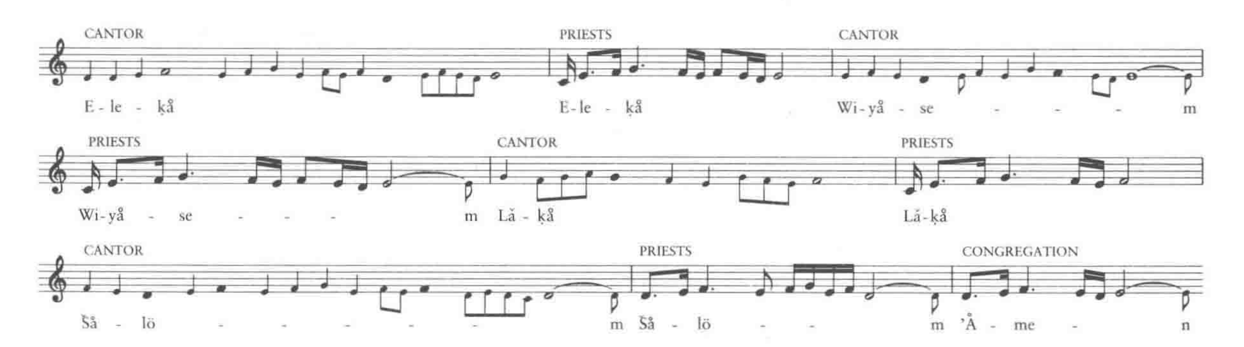
The majority of the third part of the service – the 'amidhåh ('amidah) prayer, which in the Sabbath morning liturgy consists of seven blessings – is a cantorial solo song, sung to another non-measured melody that repeats for every verse. The singing of the birkaṭ köhanim (priestly blessing), which occurs between the sixth and seventh benedictions of the 'amidhåh, also includes a number of unique features. The text, composed of three biblical verses (Numbers vi.24–6), is performed to the same tune as the 'amidhåh prayer itself but with every word sung according to the main motif 'A', the final pitch of which is the tonic (ex.19). The cantor chants the motif first and elaborates the melody constantly, it is then repeated by the priests, who sing its essential 'kernel' in a more rhythmic style in order to express their unity. The final words of the first two verses are sung to another melodic motif 'H', which functions, through its final pitch (the one below the tonic), as the 'herald' of the approaching cadence – the main motif 'A' – on which the response

'Åmen is sung by the congregation. The cadence of the third verse, which ends the entire blessing, is further emphasized by another 'preparatory' motif 'P', which precedes the 'heralding' one. A typical performance of the last four words of the third verse, together with the 'Åmen' is given in ex.19.

The Yemenites also have a unique manner of performing the hallel, the fourth part of the service consisting of Psalms cxiii–cxviii that is added to the service after the 'amidhåh on Festivals. The whole text is sung by the cantor to a special tune of non-measured rhythm, with the congregation responding hallaluyåh after every half-verse. This manner of performance appears to be of exceptional antiquity, being mentioned in the Babylonian Talmud: '. . . like an adult who reads the hallel (for a congregation) and they respond after him with the leading word' (Soṭah 30b). The Yemenites sing the first three syllables of this word syllabically while '-yå', which is stressed, is sung to a long melisma. Thus, this musical structure, which is common to all the biblical texts sung by the congregation during the service, maintains the accurate pronunciation of the words. The congregational singing of the post-biblical piyyuṭim, however, often distorts the accentuation of the Hebrew because most of their tunes consist of repeated metric patterns that do not reflect the linguistic accent.

The fifth part of the service, the Torah readings, is also performed differently by the Yemenites. Instead of having one expert in charge of the cantillation, each member of the congregation is expected to know the recitation of the Pentateuch. According to an ancient custom, every verse recited by the adult reader is followed by its Aramaic translation (Öngalös), performed by a boy who has prepared himself for several weeks for the 'job'. This Aramaic version (the 'Boy's Tune') is a simpler variant of the Hebrew Pentateuch melody (the 'Adult's Tune'). The singing of the 'Boy's Tune' by an adult is considered insulting to the congregation, whereas the use of the 'Adult's Tune' by a boy is simply forbidden; in this way the traditional hierarchy of the Yemenite society is maintained.



The Yemenite Pentateuch cantillation is again a unique practice and one that is probably another remnant of ancient tradition. Unlike other Jewish communities, where each of the 28 cantillation signs – the 'tropes' – for the 21 biblical books (except Psalms, Proverbs and the poetic sections of Job) has its own fixed musical motif, the Yemenites sing the texts according to eight musical motifs, which set only those words ending textual clauses. The remaining words are sung to reciting tones, of which the organization depends on the talent of the individual reader. The musical structure of the eight motifs expresses the degree of the disjunctive strength a particular word possesses when ending a clause. This structural principle is common to all the tunes sung during the liturgical recitations of biblical texts, which include, besides the Pentateuch, chapters from the Prophets, and from the books of Esther, Lamentation, Ruth, the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes. Ex.20 gives an example of a Pentateuch musical phrase applied to a three-part verse (see also §III, 2(ii), ex.5 above).

This example demonstrates the tendency for the first part of any verse to be sung in a 'simple' manner, whereas as the cantor (or the Pentateuch reader) approaches the end of a verse the more developed ('revered') his singing of the motifs becomes.

6. Iraq (Babylonian). The Jewish Babylonian tradition evolved in Babylonia (southern Mesopotamia; modern Iraq) following the destruction of the First Temple in 586 BCE and the subsequent Jewish exile from the Kingdom of Judah (Palestine) to Babylon. It is thought that an earlier Jewish presence existed in northern Mesopotamia (now Iraqi Kurdistan) from about 720 BCE, following the Assyrian exile of the population of the Northern Kingdom of Israel. There was a continuous Jewish presence in Babylon for over 2500 years, until the mass Jewish emigration to Israel in 1950–51, when the Iraqi government legally permitted Jews to leave the country permanently. Today, the Babylonian tradition continues mainly in Israel, England and North America, with diminishing communities in Iraq, India and East Asia.

The finest intellectual achievement of Babylonian Jewry was the compilation of the Babylonian Talmud (completed *c*6th–7th centuries CE), a religious and cultural work of enormous influence in Judaism, being the text adopted in preference to the Jerusalem Talmud and subsequently disseminated throughout the Jewish world. Babylonia was renowned for Jewish scholarship, its two principal academies, Sura and Pumbeditha, led by a succession of prominent geonim (sing. gaon: 'excellency'). Iraq had already become the 'foremost center of world Jewry two centuries before the Arab conquest' of about 635 CE (Stillman, 1979, p.29). Baghdad, the new capital city founded in 762, maintained this leadership until the end of the geonic period (*c*11th century), when it ceased to be the spiritual and intellectual centre of world Jewry as communities in Egypt and the Iberian Peninsula gained prominence.

The Babylonian religious tradition (minhaġ babli) is Orthodox. Liturgical texts, which include prayers and hymns, are printed in prayer books or, in the case of public 'reading' (cantillation) of the Pentateuch and Prophets, handwritten on parchment scrolls. A few compilations of printed music notation exist in scholarly studies (Idelsohn, HoM, ii, 1922/R; Shiloah, 1983), but the musical performance remains an oral tradition, with the attendant variety in individual performances, coupled with a tenacity in maintaining its characteristic melodies across the boundaries of time and location.

Music in the Babylonian tradition generally corresponds to the norms of Arab music theory and performing practice. Liturgical music may be metred or unmetred. Biblical cantillation (ex.21) is unmetred and performed by a soloist – the cantor, another male member of the congregation or, occasionally, a young boy; in Eastern Jewish traditions it is customary for a boy, before he reaches the age of majority (13), to chant one of more portions from the week's reading of the Pentateuch and Prophets on the Sabbath. 13 modes were identified by Idelsohn (HoM, ii, 1922/R, pp.5–6) for the recitation of the Bible and prayers: Pentateuch, Prophets, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Esther, Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Qinot, Tefilla, Seliḥot (i) and Seliḥot (ii). Ex.21 is sung in the Arabic mode of segah with the distinctive three-quarter tone between its first and second degrees. The text includes the Masoretic accents (ṭe'amim), generally treated syllabically, with occasional melismas. The Hebrew transliteration shows the pronunciation typical of the Babylonian tradition, perhaps one of the most correct phonetically with regard to biblical Hebrew (for differing viewpoints, see Idelsohn, HoM, ii, 1992/R, pp.3, 31; and Shiloah – quoting Morag – 1983, p.10).

Chants, hymns and shbaḥoth (Judeo-Arabic: 'praises') – the Babylonian term for paraliturgical piyyuṭim (Avishur, 1990–91, p.127; Shiloah, 1983, p.7) – for Sabbaths, High Holy Days, penitential prayers (seliḥoth) and Festivals provide opportunities for enthusiastic congregational participation, whether the subject matter is laudatory or one of atonement. Chants (ex.22) are generally non-metrical, unrhymed texts comprising a sentence or short passage, which may be chanted by a soloist alone, by a soloist with congregational responses, or by the entire congregation throughout. The term 'chant' is used to cover a range of performance styles from 'recitative'-like forms to those that employ a wider melodic span. Liturgical hymns (piyyuṭim; ex.23) generally have a regular metrical scheme and rhyme, and are set to metrical melodies. Hymns with a strongly melodic character are associated mainly with Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. Most congregational items are metrical, with rhythmic melodies usually ranging between a 5th and an octave. The songs are not harmonized, but because of individual differences in speed, pitch (leading to an organum-like effect), vocal timbre and ornamentation, the overall sound is characteristically heterophonic. The paraliturgical genres (shbaḥoth) include the baqqashoth ('petitions') and pizmonim ('adorations and praise', 'refrains') and are sung to metric melodies (ex.24). Pethiḥoth ('openings', 'introductions') are also religious texts that can be sung in an improvisatory (non-metrical) style to introduce a shbaḥ and set its melodic mode. In Iraq the abu shbaḥoth (Judeo-Arabic: 'father [expert] of shbaḥoth) sang both in the synagogue and at celebrations outside; he was accompanied by two or three other men, one perhaps playing a frame or other kind of drum (except on a Sabbath or major feast). Shbaḥoth are also performed in the home as 'table hymns' for the Sabbath or a festive meal.

Ex.22 Shéma' yisraél, a seliḥoth chant for Yom kippur (as performed by D. Dangoor, Bombay, 1985; transcr. S. Manasseh)

7. Kurdish Jews. Most Kurdish Jews inhabited the Iraqi 'Kurdistan' (Barazan, Mosul, Amadiya, Zakhu, Kirkuk) with a minority living in the Turkish and Syrian areas. According to ancient tradition these Jews are descendants of the Ten Tribes from the time of the Assyrian exile. They are first mentioned by the traveller Benjamin of Tudela (12th century CE). Solid information about the Kurdish Jews, however, dates only from the 16th century onwards. Emigration to Palestine began in the 1920s, and following the establishment of the State of Israel, almost all Kurdish Jews now live there.

The liturgical music of the Kurdish Jews, as it is now practised in Israel, like that of many other Jewish communities from the Middle East and Central Asia has been influenced by the Jerusalem-Sephardi style, which is close to their Arabic-influenced vernacular musical culture. However, several archaic liturgical traits may still be found in the repertory: various types of Hebrew psalmody are used, ranging from simple styles based on one or two axis pitches to more embellished ones that span over a tetrachord (these are sometimes performed responsorially, which is perhaps a remnant of pre-Masoretic traditions; Flender, 1992); the recitation of the Targum (Aramaic translation of the Bible) in a parlando style; and a particular form of biblical cantillation that does not conform to either the Tiberian system, which is widespread throughout the Jewish world, or the more indigenous Babylonian. The Kurdish Jews have a local tradition of composing and singing religious poetry (piyyuṭim) in Hebrew and Aramaic. The names and works of about 30 Kurdish Jewish liturgical poets are known from manuscript and printed sources but their poems are seldom performed.

8. CENTRAL AND EAST ASIA.

(i) Caucasus (Mountain Jews and Georgia). The distinction between the Jews of the western Caucasus (Georgia) and the Eastern (Azerbaijan, Daghestan, and Chechen Republic) – the latter known as Mountain Jews – is fundamental, for they are both ethnically and linguistically distinct.

The liturgical music of the Georgian Jews has hardly been studied. It is thought to be a particularly ancient and unique tradition, although it has been substantially transformed during the last hundred years as a result of emigration. Most Georgian Jews who settled in Israel/Palestine from the early 20th century onwards adopted in their synagogues features of the Jerusalem-Sephardi style. In Georgia itself an Ashkenazi influence is now noticeable, resulting from the influx of Russian Jews to the area from the early 19th century and the training of Georgian rabbis in the academies of Lithuania. A survey of the musical repertory of the Georgian Jewish wedding as celebrated in modern Israel (Mazor, 1986) shows that the repertory includes traditional cantillation of biblical texts, psalmody in flexible and measured rhythm and piyyuṭim (in both psalmodic style in flexible rhythm and with measured melodies) as well as melodies from non-Jewish Georgian folksongs and dance tunes, ḥasidic and neo-ḥasidic tunes, 'Oriental' Israeli songs and tunes, and Israeli folksongs. Finally, not all Georgian Jews share the same musical traditions: research has uncovered differences between the practices of eastern and western Georgia.

The liturgical music of the Mountain Jews in the eastern Caucasus is extremely austere. It consists of simple recitation formulae in flowing rhythm by the cantor or in a responsorial manner between cantor and congregation. The range is narrow (up to a 5th) and most formulae are based on descending melodic figures. The simplicity of the liturgical music of the Mountain Jews strikingly contrasts with their rich musical traditions performed outside the synagogue. Remarkably, no musical element from the surrounding culture, such as the Azeri mugham, has permeated the synagogue repertory, as has happened in most Jewish communities throughout the Islamic world. This phenomenon suggests that the Caucasian synagogue may represent an ancient approach to the performance of the liturgy in which the role of music was less prominent.

(ii) Iran. Research into the religious music of the Iranian Jews is a major desideratum. Key questions remain open, such as the relationships between the musical traditions of the different Jewish centres both within Iran itself (Tehran, Isfahan, Shiraz, Yezd, Hamadan, Mashed) and in the other Persian-speaking Jewish communities (e.g. Afghanistan, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan and Azerbaijan), and the relationship between Jewish religious music and the secular and religious music of the surrounding Muslim populations.

Until the mid-19th century, Iranian Jewry, living in the rather hostile Shi'a Muslim environment, was relatively isolated from the rest of the Jewish world, except for sporadic contacts with envoys from the Jewish community in Israel/Palestine. Their physical, economic and spiritual impoverishment awakened the interest of Jews in western Europe, who established the modern schools of the Alliance Israélite Universelle in Tehran (1898) and other cities. Since the mid-19th century Iranian Jews have been exposed to manifold cultural influences, and the recognition of their constitutional rights in 1906 led to their increasing access to the surrounding non-Jewish Iranian culture, including music.

On the basis of the available knowledge, the liturgical music of the Iranian Jews in the 20th century comprises three fundamental styles: recitation formulae with flowing rhythms and a narrow range (usually a tetrachord); adaptations of non-Jewish Iranian melodies with steady beat; and Jerusalem-Sephardi melodies. The music of recitation formulae used for texts such as biblical passages (e.g. psalms; see §III, 2(ii), ex.4 above), prose prayers, and poems (e.g. dirges for Tish'ah be-av), are determined by the structure of the text. They consist of repeated musical phrases comprising different numbers of motifs with fixed functions (e.g. opening, heralding of the cadence, cadential). This repetitive and narrow musical litany led Idelsohn to characterize the Iranian Jewish liturgy as 'sad and painful' (HoM, ii, 1922). The attempt to interpret these recitation formulae in terms of the Iranian dastgāh (Netzer, 1984), however, is conjectural. The adaptation of melodies from the classical dastgāh repertory and the vocal style of the āv¯z to the liturgical texts (especially to piyyuṭim) were frowned upon by religious authorities because such music distracts the attention of the singers from the text and diminishes the intensity of the religious experience. Nevertheless, this phenomenon increased throughout the 20th century, as Jews became more proficient in Iranian classical music. A feature characteristic of all Persian-speaking Jews is the singing of the tafsīr – the translation of religious poetry into Judeo-Persian (using Hebrew characters). The Hebrew poems with their tafsīr are compiled in books called dastakh, which sometimes include non-Jewish poetry as well.

Idelsohn already noticed the penetration of Sephardi musical and liturgical forms in his surveys of 1911 and 1921 among the Iranian Jewish immigrants in Jerusalem. The growing influence of Zionism in Iran led to an even closer relationship with the Sephardi traditions from Jerusalem, and Iranian Jews in Israel adopted the Sephardi paraliturgical repertories, such as the baqqashot. Despite this noticeable Sephardi influence, Loeb and Netzer were still able to record autochthonous melodies of liturgical and paraliturgical piyyuṭim from Shiraz and Isfahan in the late 1960s and early 1970s respectively. In the aftermath of the Islamic Revolution in the late 1970s, most Iranian Jews left Iran for the USA (especially California) and Israel where they perpetuate their musical traditions to the present.

(iii) Afghanistan. The emergence of the Jews who originate in the present-day state of Afghanistan as a distinct ethnic unit is a recent development. It took shape in the 20th century, mostly after the emigration of Jews from Herat and Kabul to Israel/Palestine. In reality, the Afghanistani Jewry has diverse origins, particularly Iranian (Persian) and Uzbeki. The religious music of the Jews of Herat is linked to that of the Jews of Mashed in north-east Iran. Many Jews flying from forced conversion to Islam during the Mashed persecutions of 1839 settled in Herat. In the religious music of the Jews from Kabul there are influences of Bukharan Jews who escaped from Bolshevik Russia and settled in Afghanistan as a temporary station on their way to Israel.

The liturgical music of the Afghanistani Jews, like that of the other Central Asian centres, is extremely simple. It consists of plain recitations with uncomplicated cadential patterns that enhance the articulation of the text. More complex melodies are found in the singing of piyyuṭim for the Sabbath and Holy Days; ex.25 shows a piyyuṭ for a Holy Day service by the poet Shelomoh. Two principal types of melodies are used for the religious poetry: metric melodies resembling styles of popular Afghanistani music with some Indian influences; and melodies in flexible rhythm without fixed metre that recall the style of the Iranian avaz. Yet all the strophic melodies of the religious poems are simple, usually consisting of between one and four short phrases repeated throughout the poem. After emigration to Israel, Jews from Afghanistan adopted the more elaborate Jerusalem-Sephardi style of liturgical music (see §III, 11(i) above).

(iv) Tajikistan and Uzbekistan (Bukhara). Jewish settlements in Central Asia were first established in Samarkand, Bukhara and Khwarezm (now in Uzbekistan), Balkh (now in Afghanistan) and Merv (now Mari, Turkmenistan), by Iranian Jews before Mongol invasions destroyed these cities in the 13th century. Jewish life in Samarkand and Bukhara was renewed during the Timurid era, which formally began in 1370. Although they share many musical features of the Iranian tradition, at the end of the 18th century Bukharan Jews (as Jews of Central Asia are commonly termed) adopted elements of Sephardi liturgical practice from a Moroccan rabbi, Yusuf Mamon Mogribi, who took up residence in Bukhara in an attempt to revive Jewish customs and traditions.

The different genres of liturgical music practised by Central Asian Jews show varying degrees of assimilation of local Muslim practices. The least assimilation is in biblical cantillation, as Idelsohn demonstrated in the first systematic documentation of the oral tradition of Jewish liturgical music from Central Asia (HoM, iii, 1922/R). Idelsohn's informants were emigrants living in Palestine, and his work established that Central Asian styles of cantillation follow the melodic contours governed by the Masoretic accents (ṭe'amim) and the modal configurations used by other 'Oriental' Jewish communities; ex.26 is an example of Bukharan Pentateuch cantillation. In contrast, among Jews still living in Central Asia prayer tunes, piyyuṭim and the chanting of the Sefer ha-zohar (Book of splendour) largely reflect the melodic and rhythmic characteristics of the (non-Jewish) Bukharan art song, in particular the Central Asian court music repertory known as shashmakom ('six makom'). For example, the Sabbath song Deror yiqrah (ex.27) is set as a contrafactum to melodies from the shashmakom. Liturgical texts, however, are not accompanied by the frame drum, which is ubiquitous in art song, and are typically sung with more rubato than is present in art song. Bukharan Jewish musicians have also performed the shashmakom to Hebrew spiritual poetry and share a common repertory of spiritual songs with Muslims, although they ascribe the texts to biblical, rather than Islamic, sources.

Assimilation of Islamic music and chant into Jewish liturgical practice has been facilitated by the overlapping social and religious worlds of Muslims and Jews. For example, Jewish musicians have long been active as performers of art song among urban Muslims in Central Asia (see below, §V, 1).

Moreover, a number of these performers were chalas (hidden Jews), who outwardly practised Islam but secretly preserved Jewish ritual traditions. Certain non-canonical practices have been borrowed from Muslims, for example antiphonal funeral laments called ḥaqqoni (from Arabic ḥaqq: 'truth' – one of the names of God frequently invoked in Iranian Sufism), which are sung by men and resemble the tensed, high-tessitura katta ashula performed by a Muslim ḥāfiẓ during the Sufi ritual of dhikr, and shaydo-i ovoz (Persian: 'chant of one possessed'), a rhythmic funeral chant led by a professional female mourner (guyanda) with refrain singing provided by other female mourners. When the deceased has not witnessed the wedding of a son or daughter, shaydo-i ovoz may assume a highly emotional form, often accompanied by drumming.

Among paraliturgical practices, the chanting of the Sefer ha-zohar is an important element of synagogue worship and provides one of the main vehicles for the display of cantorial talent (ex.28). Excerpts from the Sefer ha-zohar are chanted not only at the start of morning and afternoon services, but in the home during Sabbath meals, and on occasions commemorating the dead. Singers use different melodic modes and melodies to adapt the performance of the Sefer ha-zohar to these various occasions, and successive verses are often performed in turn by different singers, each striving to display vocal virtuosity in a kind of undeclared competition.

['Elijah began and said: "Master of the worlds, You are one but not in number; You are the highest of the high, the secret of all secrets".']

Other popular forms of paraliturgical song include a large corpus of Sabbath hymns (Heb. shi'ra), songs for Holy Days, among which Purim, Simḥat Torah, and Pesaḥ are especially rich, and festive dance-songs performed at life-cycle celebrations known generically as toi, especially at marriages or circumcisions. In Bukhara and Samarkand, groups of female Jewish entertainers (sozanda) operated like a guild, singing and dancing at both Jewish and Muslim tois, and accompanying themselves on frame drums (dâyra) and stone castanets (qayrak). All these forms of paraliturgical singing share a tendency towards the alternation of solo verse and choral refrain, encouraging communal participation in music-making.

With the increasing freedom to practise their religion that accompanied the break-up of the Soviet Union, Bukharan Jews came under the influence of missionaries from the ḥasidic Lubavitcher sect, who introduced changes intended to bring the Bukharan liturgy in line with Orthodox practices. At the same time, many Bukharan Jews emigrated from Central Asia to New York and Tel-Aviv.

By the end of the 20th century, Central Asian liturgical traditions were arguably more alive in Tel-Aviv and New York than in Transoxania.

(v) India (Bene Israel, Cochini and Iraqi). By the 20th century the Jewish population in India comprised a variety of extremely diverse communities of different (and sometimes obscure) origins and with distinct musical traditions. The basic groups are the Jews of Cochin (Kerala), the Bene Israel ('Sons of Israel') and the Iraqi (Babylonian) Jews. Although the musical traditions of these communities have been studied in recent years, much still remains to be done.

The religious music of the Jews of Cochin reflects the complex history of this community, which is internally subdivided into the Paradesi, or 'white' Jews (Portuguese, Syrian and Ashkenazi Jews who settled in Cochin from the 16th century onwards) and the Malabari, or 'black' Jews (descendants of the original Jewish population of the area). Several influences may be detected in their religious music and poetry, especially notable is a Yemenite layer. However, there is no noticeable influence of Indian music from the surrounding culture, although a possible relationship with the music of the Syriac Church in Kerala still needs to be explored. The Cochini liturgy also includes folk melodies known as 'Shingli' tunes (after the Jewish name for Cranganur, where the original Jewish settlement of Kerala was located until the 16th century).

The traveller Moses Pereyra de Paiva visited the Cochini community in the mid-17th century while on a mission on behalf of the Portuguese Jewish community in Amsterdam, and later described its musical life, stressing the use of instruments to accompany the singing of the liturgy (Notisias dos judíos de Cochin, Amsterdam, *c*1687; Portuguese trans. by M.B. Amzalak, Lisbon, 1923); unfortunately the nature of these instruments is not known. The prayerbooks and manuscripts brought by Pereyra de Paiva from Amsterdam as a gift to support their eroding religious life had a permanent influence on the religious repertory of the Cochini Jews. However, no Portuguese Jewish musical influence may be detected in the present-day oral tradition. Of particular interest are the piyyuṭim in the Sephardi style brought to India from the 16th century by Jewish emigrants from Yemen and later from the Ottoman Empire (particularly Syria). Local Cochini Jewish poets also began to compose new songs following the Sephardi models. These religious songs were collected in manuscripts and printed anthologies that are still used today. An exceptional feature is the participation of Cochini women who are versed in Hebrew in the singing of this religious poetry in the synagogue. Almost all the Jews from Cochin emigrated to Israel in the 1950s, settling in agricultural communities where their religious musical traditions are tenaciously perpetuated.

The Bene Israel trace their mythical origins to Jews who settled in India either in the time of King Solomon or after the persecutions of the Jews by Greek King Antiochus from 175 to 163 BCE. They settled in Bombay and its environs after the British conquest of this city in 1661. Before the 18th century the Bene Israel had extremely tenuous links with normative Judaism, but they returned to more traditional religious observance under the influence and coaching of immigrant Cochini Jews. Most of the Bene Israel moved to Israel in 1948 settling in several cities, especially Lod, where their central synagogue is now located. Their liturgical music is based on a set of modes, each of which is reserved for a specific occasion (Krut-Moscovich, 1986). Two main styles of performance are employed in the synagogue – 'straight singing' (phrases in syllabic style made up of simple motifs of three to four notes) and 'singing with melody' (elaborated versions of the same motifs and phrases in melismatic style); both styles employ a flowing rhythm. Religious poems in Hebrew and Marāṭhī are performed outside the synagogue, sometimes to the accompaniment of the portable harmonium and the bulbultaraṅg that were adopted from Indian music. A special genre of religious songs is the kīrtan, poetic paraphrases of biblical stories, both in Hebrew and Marāṭhī, performed by a singer called kīrtankār.

Iraqi Jews settled in Bombay and Calcutta from the early 19th century, especially after the religious persecutions of 1825–35 in Baghdad, and reached a peak population of 5000 in the 1940s. Despite the birth of several generations of Indian-born Iraqi Jews, this community maintained a fierce attachment to its original Baghdadi ancestry. Thus, their religious music, especially the singing of religious poetry (pizmonim) is in fact a branch of the Iraqi tradition (see §III, 6 above). Since the independence of India from British rule, Jews of Bombay and Calcutta have emigrated to Great Britain and the USA.

(vi) China. Although Jews are known to have lived in what is now China's Xinjiang Uighur Autonomous Region from as early as the 8th century CE, the most lastingly influential of all Jewish groups was that which came from India or Persia and settled in Kaifeng (once capital of Henan Province) between the 10th and 12th centuries. Completely isolated from other Jewish centres and absorbed into the surrounding Chinese Han and Islamic environment, this community went into decline during the 17th century and within about 200 years had effectively disappeared. From the mid-19th century, modern Jewish communities were established in concession cities (e.g. Shanghai, Harbin, Tianjin and Hong Kong) by British-Iraqi Jewish merchants from India, and immigrants from Russia, especially after the 1917 Revolution. However, the greatest influx of Jews into Shanghai resulted from Nazi persecution. All the modern communities, except those in Hong Kong, began to disintegrate after 1949.

Information concerning the Kaifeng Jewish community comes from local inscriptions and eye-witness reports of Christian missionaries. Although little is known about its music, brief and tantalizing observations have been made, often with vague and ambiguous terminology. The first Kaifeng synagogue was built in 1163. It was called a 'mosque' by the local people and looked from the outside like a typical Chinese Buddhist or Taoist temple. In its heyday, the Sabbath, Pesaḥ and most other solemn occasions (except Ḥanukkah) were strictly observed, and the three periods of daily prayer were also kept. But there was also a powerful Chinese influence in rituals, the most indicative being the worship of the ancestors of the Jews, which took place in the synagogue twice a year.

In the 12th century Persian was the vernacular language of the Kaifeng community, and the overall character of the ritual was similar to that of the Persian Jews, with part of the piyyuṭim of Rabbi Sa'adyah Gaon (882–942) and all rubrics (except for a few prayers and songs in Aramaic) recited in Persian, and with the schedule for reading the Torah and the 54 divisions of the Pentateuch following the Persian scheme. Some rituals, however, were very similar to those of the Yemenite Jews (e.g. Pesaḥ Hagadah). The ritual followed talmudic prescriptions: the faithful prayed aloud or silently, and the Hebrew readings (pronounced with a Chinese accent as well as Chinese melodic intonation) were chanted without instrumental accompaniment. Wearing blue head-dresses and taking off their shoes, the worshippers stepped and bent forwards and backwards and bowed to the left and right as they intoned certain portions of the liturgy. A 'monitor' (a manla, from Arabic mullah), stood by the ḥazzan and corrected the reading or chanting. Where necessary, the manla was likewise attended by another monitor. The ḥazzan in Kaifeng was also a rabbi; originally he was known as an ustād (Persian), but later as a zhang-jiao (Chinese-Islamic). Processional rituals, especially the festival of Simḥat Torah, are known to have been celebrated with the chanting of prayers. To call worshippers to pray, the leader of the synagogue would beat a jade chime (fig.17), a gong of black marble or a pair of wooden clappers; all of these are typical Chinese Buddhist temple instruments. This practice, however, is paralleled among Chinese Muslim muezzins, who, in some cases, summon the faithful with the above instruments instead of the human voice.

17. Jade chime used by the Jews of Kaifeng (Royal Ontario Museum, Toronto); the inscription reads: 'The jade chime which calls to the spirits of the departed and the living'

Among the four Jewish communities in Shanghai, the British-Iraqis, especially during the 19th century, strictly adhered to the traditional Sephardi practice, taking instructions on religious customs directly from Baghdad. Their chant featured responsorial and perhaps even choral singing. The liturgy of the Russian Jews in Shanghai originally followed Sephardi practice, but it was later completely taken over by more Orthodox elements from the Polish refugees in the early 1940s. The majority of the Austro-German refugees, from the Reformist Liberal synagogue, created a congregation of their own, and employed the harmonium, a mixed male choir and even female soloists in their services. After 1938 there were about 20 ḥazzanim active in both Sephardi and Ashkenazi services; they formed the Gemeinshaft jüdischer Kantoren Shanghai in 1939.

The Jewish community in Hong Kong, the only one now surviving in China, are mainly of Iraqi and European origin, most belonging to the Orthodox denomination. Ohel Leah, built in 1901, is the only synagogue holding regular services in East Asia.

9. Ethiopia (Beta Israel/Falasha). The community today known as the Ethiopian Jews has historically been known in Ethiopia itself by two names, 'Beta Israel' ('House of Israel') and 'Falasha'. Thought to descend from indigenous Agau peoples, the Ethiopian Jewish community apparently emerged out of a complex interaction with Judaized Ethiopian Christian monks in the 14th and 15th centuries. The first, isolated reference to the Beta Israel occurs in a 15th-century Ethiopian source; subsequent evidence proliferates only from the 16th century onwards. There is no documented contact between the Beta Israel and Jews of other traditions before the mid-19th century, and sustained relationships with other Jewish communities began only in the early 20th century.

The textual, liturgical and musical content of the traditional Beta Israel liturgy, the outcome of the complex Beta Israel history in Ethiopia (itself the subject of a vast literature), varies significantly from universal Jewish models; its origins seem to lie in traditions inherited from the Ethiopian Orthodox Church (see Ethiopia, §II). No literary or musical genres corresponding to the piyyuṭ and related paraliturgical chants were known in the Beta Israel community, nor was there any cyclical recitation of the Bible. The liturgical texts, which can be dated from the 14th century onwards, are in classical Ethiopic (Ge'ez), which was also shared by the Christian Church, occasionally interspersed with an indigenous Cushitic language (Agau); no Hebrew was known or used by the Beta Israel until its introduction by Western Jews in the mid-20th century. The Beta Israel observed a short morning ritual (sebḥata negh) and evening service (wāzēmā) daily, as well as more elaborate liturgies beginning well before dawn on annual Holy Days and extending through the night on important fasts.

While there are prayer texts preserved in manuscripts and a small Beta Israel literature (non-liturgical), the liturgy and its music was learnt and performed exclusively as a sung oral tradition. Until the 20th century, liturgical transmission was guided primarily by Beta Israel monks and performed by specially trained musicians (dabtarā). With the decline of these divisions of the clergy, responsibility for liturgical and religious practice was assumed by ordained priests (qēs), who performed all the music.

Ex.29 Beta Israel prayer Kalḥu kwellu malā'ekt set in qwāmi zēmā, as performed by Gete Asrass, 12 May 1973

['All the angels proclaimed and said: "holy Lord of hosts".']

By the 20th century the male congregation could not participate actively because they did not understand Ge'ez. Traditionally women played no role in Beta Israel worship.

Beta Israel liturgical melodies, known as zēmā, supported the performance of lengthy, primarily strophic, texts paraphrasing the Bible and the Psalms. As late as the 1970s, Beta Israel priests still performed the complete liturgy in village prayerhouses and were able to name three categories of zēmā, two of which (kaffettaññā: 'high', 'lofty', and qwāmi: 'steady', 'usual') could be defined through ethnographic observation and analysis of recordings. Kaffetaññā zēmā is based on a hemitonic pentatonic pitch set, while qwāmi zēmā may be described as outlining a series of 3rds of variable inflection. Ex.29 is a transcription of the prayer 'Kalḥu kwellu malā'ekt' ('All the angels proclaimed'); set in qwāmi zēmā it is sung before dawn as part of the Night Office on weekdays, Sabbaths and Holy Days (it also occurs in the Ethiopian Orthodox church liturgy).

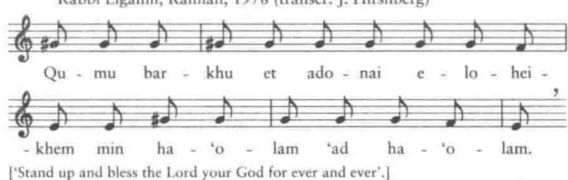
Except on the Sabbath and fast days, much of the liturgy was accompanied by a repeated five-beat rhythm played on the kettledrum (nagārit) and metal gong (qachel); some prayers are sung in a free rhythm. Unison or heterophonic textures dominated the liturgy, often performed in antiphony; on Holy Days the priests sometimes joined together in liturgical dance.

Changes in Beta Israel religious life throughout the 20th century culminated in the migration of the entire community to Israel by the early 1990s. Active transmission of the musical liturgy in Israel is limited. Excerpts are occasionally performed by elderly clergy in private and at public events, but most Ethiopian Jews have tended to join existing synagogues and to adopt the Hebrew liturgy.

Studio recordings have been made in Israel at the National Sound Archives of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. A few published recordings and a collection of field tapes deposited in the Indiana University Archives of Traditional Music provide documentation of the Beta Israel musical tradition during its final decades in Ethiopia. Recent research on the Ethiopian Christian zēmā provides further insights into musical and liturgical concepts and structures once shared by the Beta Israel.

10. Karaite. In the 8th century CE Judaism was split by a schism into Karaites (named from miqra, the Hebrew designation of the Bible) who upheld the teaching of the Old Testament alone as emanating from divine provenance, and Rabbanites, who regarded later interpretations in the Mishnah and the Talmud as sacred sequels of the Bible.

Although Jerusalem was the holy centre of Karaite Judaism, other Karaite communities also flourished from the Middle Ages, mostly in Byzantium and later in Turkey, the Crimea, Poland and Egypt. In Egypt during the rule of Muhammad Ali (1805–48) and especially after the British occupation in 1882 the ancient community of Cairo increased in size and emerged as the largest Karaite population, attracting immigrants from Istanbul and the Crimea, such as Hakham ('the Wise') Tovia Babovitch. World War II brought about the dispersal of the Karaite communities in eastern Europe. The number of committed Karaite Jews has dwindled during the past few centuries to about 40,000 worldwide.



The Karaites of Cairo developed a cohesive community around the synagogue at the Harat el Yahud ('Jewish Quarter') and a second synagogue opened in the Abassiyeh Quarter in 1931. The musical tradition of the Karaites is entirely liturgical and paraliturgical, that is, there is no 'secular' Karaite music. The Cairo community claimed that its musical heritage was markedly different from that of the surrounding Egyptian culture, though mutual influences were frequent. Most salient was the case of the Karaite musician Da'ud Ḥusni (1876–1937), who acquired national fame with his operas and songs, some sung by Umm Kulthum. Ḥusni's songs were set both to Arabic secular texts and to Karaite paraliturgical rhymed poetry. The nature of the relationships between the musical heritage of the Karaites of Cairo and that of mainstream Egyptian music still awaits systematic study.

The deterioration of political relations between Egypt and Israel in 1948 led to the persecution and eventual expulsion of the entire Cairo community between 1950 and 1970. Most Karaites settled in Israel, where they received religious autonomy and established their centre in Ramlah, and the ancient 'Anan Ben-David shrine in Jerusalem was restored. A smaller group settled in the USA, where an active and well-organized community has developed in the San Francisco Bay area. Such radical displacement has put the future existence of world Karaism in jeopardy, and the preservation and reconstruction of the musical heritage has become an important factor in unifying the community.

The Karaite prayerbook (siddur) is completely different in structure from those of the Rabbanite Jews, although many verses are shared. The Karaite siddur consists mostly of verses from the Scriptures, especially from the Psalms, to which piyyuṭim were gradually added. An important element in the Karaite prayers and customs is mourning for the destruction of the Temple. The siddur is the same for all Karaite Jews, yet the orally transmitted musical traditions differ from one centre to another. So far the music of only the Cairo community has been documented and studied, although sporadic recordings of less accessible or disbanded centres are kept in the National Sound Archives (Jerusalem) and elsewhere.

The Karaite service is held twice daily, morning and evening. Services on the Sabbath and on High Holy Days are much longer and elaborate. Whereas the texts were canonized in the siddur, the music was orally transmitted. The verb signifying cantillation is le-nagen ('to inflect the tune') hence the use of the noun nigun signifying recurring patterns of intervals, unlike its meaning in ḥasidic music. The nigunim can be loosely defined as modes, although there is no strict modal system in Karaite cantillation. The siddur contains frequent rubrics referring to modal change, such as nigun galut ('exile mode') for sad texts, or simply vetakhlif ('change' the tune). Most of the service ed in responsorial style, that is, the cantor and the congregation alternate verses or half-verses, in accordance with the parallel structure of the Psalms. In fewer cases, mostly in lamentations, the congregation keeps repeating the first verse as a litany while the cantor proceeds through the chapter.

The cantor prays standing on the carpeted floor facing the shrine of the Torah Scroll and the members all stand in rows behind him. There are distinctions between the weekday mode (ex.30), the mode for the Sabbath, and the exile mode for lamentation (ex.31). The exile mode differs from the weekday mode not only in its intervallic patterns but also in its much wider melodic range. The cantor varies the melody in accordance with the number of syllables and his individual way of stressing important words, whereas the alternating response of the congregation remains unchanged. A few climactic sections are rendered as metric choral songs, such as the Song of the Sea (ex.32). The weekly portions of the Torah are recited according to the Karaite system of Masoretic accents.

The Karaites employ no professional cantors. Rabbis lead most services, yet any competent lay member may be invited to act as celebrant. Notable members of the congregation are entrusted with chanting certain important verses or blessings. Women never lead the service and they pray from an enclosed area in the back of the synagogue, although a prominent woman may frequently be entrusted with an important verse in the course of the service. No instruments are ever used in the synagogue.

The dispersal of the Cairo Karaites into eight communities in Israel has inevitably led to the emergence of local variants. The religious leaders have attempted to maintain a central tradition by organizing festive services, such as the traditional gathering in Jerusalem at Pesaḥ and at Sukkot, as well as by seminars for rabbinical candidates and summer camps for the youth.

The Karaite paraliturgical songs (siddur, iv) are rhymed poems (piyyuṭ) sung on many occasions of the life cycle, such as following the liturgical wedding ceremony. Many of the old tunes were lost in the trauma of the expulsion from Cairo, although young Karaite rabbis have recovered a few from older members of the community and private recordings, such as the slow, ornamental song preserved in a recording by the venerable rabbi Lieto Nono (ex.33). Yet most Karaites have preferred a more recent and livelier version for the same poem (ex.34). The Karaite folk composer Moshe Baruch Tanani (1927–98) invented new melodies approved by the Chief Rabbis. These tunes became popular among Karaites in Israel, but gained no foothold in the San Francisco community. They reveal external influences, for example Ya petaḥ na follows the symmetrical rhythmic dance pattern and the accompaniment with finger drumming typical of many ḥasidic dance songs (ex.35). At the end of the 20th century Tanani was the only new composer in the community. In 1997 the Karaites also founded the Ahva youth choir which has performed on many occasions and recorded a selection of the paraliturgical melodies arranged for choir with rhythm group.

11. 20th-century developments.

(i) Sephardi. The consolidation and imposition of the 'Jerusalem-Sephardi' style of liturgical music has been the main development in 20th-century Israel. This style is based on the Arabic maqāmāt of the modern Middle Eastern urban music that has replaced the Turkish makamlar, reflecting the growing importance of Palestine, and specifically of Jerusalem, as the liturgical music centre of modern Sephardi Jewry. The 'Jerusalem-Sephardi' style incorporates older layers of the Ottoman Sephardi traditions from Turkey and Syria (particularly Aleppo), combined with new melodies adopted from current Egyptian art and popular music (e.g. by Muḥammad 'Abd al-Wahhāb and Farīd al-Aṭrash). Sephardi cantors, many of whom are now trained in formal schools of cantors in Israel, are expected to conduct the liturgy using the Arabic maqāmāt (see Mode, §V, 2) and to be acquainted with new Arabic songs released on the market in order to incorporate them into the services. Each service, especially the complex Sabbath morning liturgy, is based on a single maqām. During the course of the service, the cantor adapts the maqām to different musical genres: for the fast recitation of texts in prose he uses only the basic tetrachord and cadential patterns of the maqām; for the singing of opening or closing texts of key sections in the liturgy he may develop a mawwwāl, an elaborated improvisation in which the entire range of the maqām is explored and modulations to other maqāmāt appear; finally, poetic sections are set by the cantor (with the congregation joining him on the refrain or throughout the song) to metric melodies in the maqām of the service.

The Jerusalem-Sephardi style developed around the élite rabbinical academics of Jerusalem and has been adopted in Israel by most non-Sephardi 'Oriental' Jews (e.g. Iranian, Kurdish, Bukharan, Iraqi, Yemenite) because of its social prestige and musical appeal. Distinguished Jerusalem-Sephardi cantors are generally of non-Sephardi origin. Some, such as Asher Mizraḥi, Mordechai Halfon and Rahamim Amar, were also composers of original pieces for soloist and choir. This style has also influenced considerably the liturgical practices of the entire Sephardi diaspora since World War II via wandering cantors from Jerusalem and, more recently, through the use of cassettes, compact discs and videos produced in Israel.

['The time of love, my beloved, come into my garden.']

Ex.34 A more recent paraliturgical setting of the same song as in ex.33, recorded in Jerusalem, 1978 (transcr. J. Hirshberg)

Further impetus to the Jerusalem-Sephardi style was provided by the custom of the paraliturgical baqqashot. Originating in the Ottoman tradition (see §III, 4(ii) above), the baqqashot developed in the city of Aleppo (Syria) in the second half of the 19th century and was sanctioned in Jerusalem in the early 20th. It consists of the singing of Hebrew poems early on Sabbath mornings during winter. The poems are mostly set to Arabic melodies, particularly muwashshaḥāt, and are performed antiphonally by two choirs. Each poem is in a different maqām and they are linked to each other by psalm verses which the soloists in each choir use as modulatory bridges between the maqāmāt. Proficiency in the singing of the Jerusalem-Sephardi baqqashot is considered as a high musical achievement for any cantor in Israel today. The drive to perform these (and other) sacred poems with instrumental accompaniment (forbidden on Sabbaths) led to the development of concerts of Sephardi religious poetry and cantorial music held on weekdays.

In North Africa, the French and Italian colonial protectorates (beginning in Algeria in the 1830s) exposed the Jews of the urban centres of the Maghrib to Western styles of music as well as to modern popular Arabic music. This exposure led to the development of modern popular Arabic music among Jews and its emergence as a distinct influence in their liturgy. A major source of this influence was the schools of the Alliance Israélite Universelle, a network of secular vocational schools promoted by French Jews. Musical elements from the 19th-century synagogues of Paris, for example the use of trained choirs and original compositions, were adopted. A prayer book, Sefer tehilloth yisrael (1906), printed by Joseph Cohen of the 'progressive' Portuguese community in Tunis, contains notations of melodies by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer and Rossini, amid Maghribi and Middle Eastern popular songs, all set to liturgical texts. Ashkenazi musical influences on the Sephardi liturgy in North Africa resulted from the activities of the Ḥabad and the religious Zionist movements in these areas. The impact of Egyptian popular music on the Maghrib also affected the Sephardi Jews of North Africa. Following this impact, the Jerusalem-Sephardi style exercised a major influence in the Maghrib. The famous Jerusalemite cantor and composer Asher Mizraḥi (1890–1967), who served in Tunis from 1929, was the major representative of this style in North Africa. Despite the ongoing Jerusalemite influence on Maghribi cantors in Israel, their particular style and repertory (based on Andalusian modes and melodies) is still heard in the synagogues of towns in Israel where the majority of the population is North African, as well as in synagogues of Maghribi Jews in France, the USA and Canada.

['Lord, please open the gates of heaven. Lord erect the edifice of Jerusalem. Lord, let your light glow on the righteous, Lord my God,']

The towering figure of Rabbi David Buzaglo (d 1975), a Hebrew poet and expert in the Moroccan Andalusian tradition, was crucial to the survival of the main baqqashot tradition in Morocco and later in Israel, to where he emigrated in 1965. Like his Arabic contemporaries in Morocco, Rabbi Buzaglo widened his musical horizons by adopting contemporary Egyptian music into his repertory, setting new Hebrew songs to popular Egyptian, as well as Algerian and Tunisian melodies.

(ii) USA. 20th-century developments, especially those after 1950, are characterized by many innovations in American Jewish musical content and liturgical performing practice. All have been influenced by three watershed historical events: the culmination, around 1920, of the mass migration of central European Jews to the USA; the annihilation of most of the remaining European Jewish community by 1945 in the Holocaust; and the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948. One important outcome was a renewed emphasis upon Hebrew language worship pronounced in a Sephardi style; another was the institutionalization of American Jewish religious musical life by three denominations, including the founding in 1947 of the School of Sacred Music at Hebrew Union College, New York (Reform), the Cantor's Institute in 1951 at the Jewish Theological Seminary (Conservative), and the Cantorial Training Institute in 1954 at Yeshiva University, New York (Orthodox). Cantorial schools provided settings in which liturgical continuity and purposeful change subsequently interacted, ranging from a shift from the German to the east European tradition following World War II (Schleifer, 1995, p.62) to the introduction of the female cantor in the 1970s. The professionalization of the cantorate, the emergence of the cantor-scholar and the open discussion of musical values and change at annual meetings and in sectarian publications have served to reposition much of the debate about musical innovation and change, extending it to the musical practitioners themselves, as well as rabbinical circles. At the same time, widespread interest remains in cantorial singing and its repertory, a tradition that has its roots in the 'Golden Age' of cantorial performances and recordings of the first half of the 20th century (Schleifer, 1995, pp.66–7).

Pluralism in American religious life has encouraged diversity in the American Jewish community, which has led to multiple streams of Jewish musical tradition, most of which are centred in synagogues that serve both religious and social needs. Musical practice in the Reform Movement has been deeply influenced by the folk music revival of the 1950s and 1960s, which brought openly experimental performing practices, including dance, into many synagogues (Shelemay, 1987). The compositions of both Jeff Klepper and Debbie Friedman have gained an enthusiastic following and, through their accessibility, have spurred an increase in congregational singing. While many Reform (as well as some Conservative) synagogues continue to use a choir accompanied by an organ to perform the liturgy, the number of new art music compositions, as well as the special occasions on which they are performed (such as the annual Friday Evening Liturgical Music Service mounted by the Park Avenue Synagogue of New York City), appear to have declined since 1980.

Innovations have also taken place in more traditional quarters. The Ḥavurah, usually considered a 'traditionalizing trend' shaped by the 1960s counter culture, is credited with inventing a practice of using traditional chants for Torah cantillation with English texts (Weissler, pp.2, 17). While the value placed upon the maintenance of tradition has limited large-scale liturgical and musical innovation in the Orthodox domain, the popular music of Israel and the USA has had a major impact on various Orthodox and ḥasidic practices.

A variety of techniques are used to refresh the liturgy, such as the Syrian Jewish practice of improvising melodies in the Arabic maqāmāt. American synagogues have continued the time-tested practice of incorporating familiar secular or popular melodies into their liturgies. A prominent source of borrowings from the late 20th-century onwards has been Israeli folksongs, such as 'Jerusalem of Gold', which is widely used to set the qaddish prayer in synagogues of all denominations in the United States.

Similarly, a wide array of American musical forms provide rich resources for liturgical contrafacta, allowing melodies to cross boundaries in unexpected ways. Lubavitcher Ḥasidim have used the melody from a popular soft-drink commercial to compose a new nigun, while Syrian Jews have adapted American show tunes and patriotic songs for paraliturgical and liturgical use. Many American synagogues stage elaborate Holy Day rituals with colourful musical content, such as the integration of popular American tunes into the Simḥat Torah observance at the Tremont Avenue Shul in Boston.

IV. Non-liturgical music

1. Introduction.

(i) Definitions. Jewish folk music emerges from the dialectic between two contrasting conditions in Jewish culture and history, and the response of music to these conditions. It functions either to maintain and reproduce what is essentially Jewish or to interact with and transform the non-Jewish. Definitions of Jewish folk music, therefore, stress its ability to express internal traits or to change in accordance with external traits. These definitions, however, are themselves contested, and they produce considerable disagreement in both theory and practice. The concern over the definitions of Jewish folk music reflects constantly changing relations between Jewish culture in the Diaspora and that in Israel, as well as the fragile framework characterizing the debates over what is and is not Jewish.

The dialectic underlying definitions of Jewish folk music extends to a broad range of musical concepts and practices. At one extreme, folk music is local, transitional and specific to a community or place. The languages or dialects in which it may be sung and the customs with which it is associated are similarly local and shared entirely neither by other Jewish communities nor by non-Jewish cultures. In contrast, some definitions argue that folk music must be globally present to be truly Jewish. Repertories should extend across community and linguistic boundaries in order to express a core of customs linking the Jews as a people.

The elements of Jewish folk music bear witness to this conceptual and definitional dialectic: song texts may be in Jewish (e.g. Hebrew or Ladino) or non-Jewish languages (e.g. Russian or Arabic); song contexts may be sacred or secular; performing practices may require an insider's knowledge or an experience outside the community; repertories may be shared by many in a community or highly specialized; song and instrumental music may fall into entirely different cultural domains.

Concepts of Jewish folk music reflect the historical ambivalence or conflict about Jewish music in general. Orthodox religious interpretation may hold that music abstracted from text, notably instrumental music, should not be allowed in the synagogue or elsewhere. Strictly speaking, folk music that reveals influences from non-Jewish contexts becomes inappropriate, if not suspect. Such concepts may exclude instrumental practice, for example, and excoriate specialized musicians. Strict definitions often go one step further, actually redefining acceptable practices by insisting on an unbroken connection to biblical practices or pre-diasporic repertories. Early 20th-century scholars such as A.Z. Idelsohn (1914–32/R) and J. Schönberg (1926) applied traditional concepts of folksong to Jewish repertories to various degrees, arguing that oral transmission had undergirded historical connections to the distant past, further lending folksong great age. As Jewish folk music was redefined for modern purposes it retained also its local qualities and contexts for the family, ritual and community. New definitions, for example those stressing the possibility of Israeli nationalism (Nathan, 1994), stressed and expanded the potential for folk music to be Jewish.

Jewish folk music lends itself to definition only in relation to concepts and practices of folk music in the larger cultures of which a given community is a part. Folksong in eastern Europe, for example, differs conceptually from that in central Europe, as does that in North Africa from practices in the Middle East or Central Asia. Ashkenazi and Sephardi concepts of folk music differ greatly. Within Sephardi folksong, moreover, distinctions may result from connections to Iberian narrative genres or the interaction of Balkan and Turkish practices with the musics of Muslim neighbours (Katz, 1972–5).

There are many ways that the Jewishness of folk music is maintained from within. Text plays a particularly important role in defining the inside of Jewish traditions. Songs with texts in Jewish languages strengthen the inside and hinder oral tradition from extending beyond Jewish practices. History, especially the connectedness of the Jewish present to Israel, is a persistent internal trait for many repertories. Historical connectedness may also assume local forms, as in the pilgrimage songs of Iraqi Jewish women, the Judeo-Arabic texts of which articulate links to the shrines of ancestors (Avishur, 1987). Folk music synchronically serves as a means of using Jewishness to negotiate the connections between private, semi-public and public spheres in Jewish society, thus spinning a musical and cultural web of which family, synagogue and everyday community experiences are equally a part.

Folk music indexes many of the confrontations between Jewish and non-Jewish traditions, and it thereby participates in the negotiations between self and other. Throughout the Diaspora Jewish folk music regularly absorbs non-Jewish components, for example language, melodic structures, or scalar and modal forms, as Moisey Beregovsky (1892–1961) observed in his studies of Ashkenazi folk music in Russia and Ukraine (Slobin, 1982). Looking for music in isolation on the island of Djerba, Tunisia, during the 1920s, Robert Lachmann discovered instead that the folk music of Jewish communities was indistinguishable from that of the surrounding Muslim and Maghribi cultures (1940; repr. 1978). Folk music in Middle Eastern Jewish communities makes full use of the modal systems of the region, for example maqām in Syrian and Egyptian Jewish repertories. The dance forms of the Ashkenazi klezmer ensembles (e.g. the widespread doina from Romanian folk music) similarly locate Jewish practices in the midst of non-Jewish traditions (Salmen, 1991). Border-crossing sometimes proceeds so far that it negates the boundaries between inside and outside, for example in the ballad Die Jüdin ('The Jewish Girl'), which appears in the standard German ballad repertory and in Yiddish variants (see Ginsburg and Marek, 1901/R; Bohlman, 1992).

To some extent the definitional dialectic marks the distinction between folksong and folk music. Broadly derived from folksong and folk-music scholarship since Herder, this distinction is particularly important in Jewish practices. Concepts of folksong often reflect the internal markers of identity, especially language and liturgical function; concepts of folk music, especially folk dance, reflect external markers. Folksong results from everyday practice; folk music is possible only because of specialization and professionalism.

Creativity and composition play a particularly powerful role in concepts of Jewish folksong. As it is usually understood, however, composition is a matter of creating the new from the old. Pizmonim (Heb., sing. pizmon) form a genre of songs composed for special occasions, often in the life cycle, by utilizing pre-existing materials, often combining them in especially creative ways (Shelemay, 1988). Collecting and anthologizing folksong, which results from the widespread cultural motivation to remember and conserve the past, usually involves recomposition in one form or another, such as settings for piano and voice or mixed chorus (Nadel, 1937; Rubin, 1950; Nathan, 1994). The historiography of Jewish folksong may be calibrated according to the moments when conscious attempts to compose from folksong were especially evident. Similarly, improvisation has a special significance in concepts of Jewish folk tradition, for it results from recombining the traditional through performance to create the new, for example through processes of contrafaction in the ghettos and concentration camps of the Holocaust (Flam, 1992; see §V, 2(iv) below) or in the ensemble music of Iraqi Jewish immigrants to Israel (Shiloah, 1983). Composition and improvisation, furthermore, serve as a link between popular Jewish music (e.g. Yiddish theatre) and folk music. Not only does song from the Yiddish theatre adapt folksong for the stage, but Yiddish folksong frequently evolves through oral tradition from the transformation of popular theatre songs into folksongs (Slobin, Tenement Songs, 1982).

The definitional dialectic is strikingly paradoxical: although Jewish folksong and music is overtly tradition- and past-bound, it responds to change and modernity. Song is traditional because of its malleability and adaptability. The newness of folk music, for example in the haskalah (Jewish enlightenment) or on kibbutzim in Israel, reflects folk music's capacity to index the past. Accordingly, the recent history of Jewish folksong and music reveals the emergence and invention of new forms and genres. Very distinctive bodies of folk music, for example, represent Israeli nationalism (Bohlman and Slobin, 1986; Nathan, 1994), albeit at a level of considerable multi-culturalism and ethnic diversity. The revival of Jewish folksong, too, bears witness to this paradox; perhaps the best example is the renewal of interest in Yiddish song and klezmer music in eastern Europe after the fall of communism. The ability to negotiate between past and present, old and new, sacred and secular, and self and other gives folksong and folk music a powerful presence in Jewish society.

(ii) Performance contexts. Folk music is generally perceived as the 'secular' Jewish music. Such a perception evades the critical role of religion in all aspects of traditional Jewish life. Thus, the content or style of Jewish folk music may not be related to religious themes but its contexts of performance are founded on the prescriptions of religious life. Secular contexts properly exist in moments of privacy, such as when a mother rocks her baby.

Jewish folk music is performed within assigned social contexts: rites of passage, communal celebrations and entertainment. Vocal music predominates while instrumental music plays a secondary role. Folksongs in vernacular Jewish languages are generally performed by women, contrasted with the dominance of male voices in liturgical and most paraliturgical music. However, religious hymns in Hebrew performed by men are sung to tunes that often overlap with those of folksongs in the vernacular sung by women. Jewish folk instrumentalists are usually male, but there are cases (e.g. Iraq, Yemen and Morocco) in which professional women singers accompany themselves with percussion instruments.

Jewish law (halakhah) prescribes the occasion and manner of celebration of rites of passage in which folk music is performed: the period between the birth of a male infant and his circumcision at the age of eight days, the naming of a baby girl, the entrance of young boys to adult society at the age of 13 (bar-mitzvah), engagement and wedding, and the seven-day period of mourning.

The wedding is the richest musical event of the Jewish life cycle. It consists of a series of events, usually spanning a week, that includes parties in which gifts are exchanged between the families, the presentation of the dowry, the ritual bath of the bride, the ceremonial hairdressing and dressing of the bride, and, in Islamic countries on the night before the wedding, the ḥenna ceremony in which red vegetable dye is applied to the hands and feet of the bride. The actual wedding ceremony takes place under a canopy, followed by the festive sheva' berakhot ('seven blessings'). The reading of the Torah by the groom in the synagogue on the following Sabbath and the first meal cooked by the bride occur after the wedding ceremony. The texts of the songs sung during these ceremonies describe the associated customs and their meaning, and treat the roles and characteristics of the participants, in particular the mother-in-law. The use of instrumental music in weddings is encouraged following the talmudic deed 'to gladden the groom and bride' (Berakhot 6b). However, instrumental music is banned, as a sign of mourning for the destruction of the Temple, from weddings held in Jerusalem by some of the city's ultra-Orthodox Ashkenazi communities.

Religious folk festivals such as the Moroccan mimuna (the night of the seventh day of Pesaḥ) or the Kurdish saharane (Sukkot) serve as an important setting for the performance of folk music. A major religious festival shared by all Jews (North African and ḥasidic in particular) is the hillulah of Rabbi Simeon Bar Yoḥai held in Meron (Upper Galilee) on Lag ba-omer (the 33rd day between Pesaḥ and Shavu'ot). All these festivals include the performance of instrumental music and Hebrew and secular songs by folk musicians who entertain the public on formal or informal stages. These festivals have been revitalized in Israel in recent decades.

In addition to sanctioned life-cycle events and religious festivals, folksongs appear in many other contexts. The lullaby repertory is rich in most Jewish communities. In many cases, songs unrelated to a child's environment are sung as lullabies, for example, the Sephardi romances (see §IV, 2(ii) below). Courting songs are found in communities where premarital social relations between couples became customary. Folksongs are also used as educational tools, for instance to teach the alphabet in elementary schools. The singing of epic songs, either of Jewish content, such as biblical episodes or events related to the history of the community, or adopted from surrounding cultures, is found in such Eastern communities as the Kurdish Jews and those of the Caucasus, Central Asia, India and Iran. The function of these songs is to entertain or educate the family or the community after working hours or during winter nights.

The decline of traditional folk music followed the mass migrations and urbanization experienced by most Jewish communities since the 19th century. Electronic media have had a critical impact on Jewish folk music. Traditional music, reconstructed in commercial recordings produced in Europe, the USA and the Middle East, often substituted for live performances, and instrumental folk tunes became popular in new arrangements. Only some of these folk tunes are still functional at weddings; most are now intermingled with pop music performed by rock bands or disc jockies. More recently the mass media have revived older styles of folk music after periods of decay. The case of klezmer instrumental music from eastern Europe is the most remarkable (see §IV, 3(ii) below). Mediated folksongs in Yiddish and Ladino that are distributed commercially appeal today to Jewish and non-Jewish audiences. Most of these reconstructed songs comprise the bulk of Jewish songs known today to the public at large.

2. FOLKSONGS IN JEWISH LANGUAGES.

(i) Judeo-Arabic.

(a) Yemen. The Yemenite Jews recognize two kinds of non-liturgical music: 'men's singing' and 'women's singing'. The first, regarded as the more prestigious, is based on texts from the Diwan, the traditional collection of Hebrew, Aramaic and Arabic poems written mainly by Rabbi Shålöm Shabbazi (1619–80), and is performed only by men. The second, based on Arabic poems transmitted by means of oral tradition, is sung by women. These two repertories developed directly from the singing and dancing at family parties, especially wedding ceremonies, that take place within two simultaneous circles: one male, the other female.

'Men's singing' consists of cycles of songs divided into three parts according to the literary structure of the poems: shirim, shirot and hallelöth. All the lines of a shir (pl. shirim; Arabic nashid), the first type of poems, are identical not only with regard to their metrical structure but also their rhyme scheme. The men sit in a circle and one singer, at the request of his friends, assumes the role of leader. The latter holds the Diwan and decides which poem to sing and the tune to which it will be sung. He also determines where to disrupt the continuity of the melody in order to insert ornaments or improvisatory passages. In addition, he decides if and when the tempo should be quickened up or slowed down, and where to switch from one tune to another. The non-measured, recitative-like character of the singing is based on an antiphonal style of performance: the leader begins, and after one or two lines those sitting near him join his melody while others contribute the response. After performing the written text, the singer adds a verse built of phrases from the Psalms ('Annå 'adhönåi, höshi'åh nå; 'Annå 'adhönåi, haṣliḥåh nå) and sung to a fixed melody that serves as a bridge to the tune of the following poem.

A shir usually precedes a shiråh (pl. shiröth), the second type of poems. The prosody of every shiråh is generally in shir ezor form (the Arabic muwashshaḥ), consisting of about 7–12 textual units, each composed of three stanzas. The first stanza contains three or four two-part lines, the second (tawshiḥ) includes three or four short lines, and the third has one or two lines identical in form, metre and rhyme to the lines of the first stanza. The musical style of shiråh differs from that of the previous shir in its fixed rhythmical and metrical patterns, but here, too, the musical phrase is repetitive and parallels a complete line. The melody of the second stanza differs slightly from the melody of the first, but, again, is repetitive and parallels each line. Dancing, with added drumming accompaniment, takes place when the shiråh is performed on weekdays. When dances occurs, melodic differences are also expressed by a change in the pattern of the steps. The tune of the third stanza may differ from those of the two previous stanzas or it may resemble the tune of the first one. The leader begins singing the first one or two lines, then those sitting nearest him join in singing the opening parts of the phrases, and those furthest away responding with the closing parts. The mounting excitement provides the soloist with an opportunity to display his talent: he ornaments his singing and the shiråh itself by extending the musical phrases with trills at fixed points, and by longer improvisations between each line and especially between stanzas. The soloist makes gradual or sudden changes of tempo, as well as sudden switches of tunes. For the last line of the shiråh, the leader performs a new recitative which leads directly to the subsequent poem. During this recitative all the dancers return to their seats and prepare themselves for the singing of the final poem of the cycle, the Hallaluyåh.

The poems of this third part, the hallelöth, differ from other Diwan texts in style, form and social function. Most consist of four to ten verses, of different length but uniform rhyme. Every poem begins and ends with the word 'wa-Hallaluyåh', and all lines are unified by the musical formulae to which they are sung. The leader starts the poem by singing 'wa-Hallaluyåh', followed by the first verse, performed according to a fixed recitative tune based on a non-measured rhythm. The participants continue singing the poem along the same melodic course but now in a measured rhythm based on two values, short and long, sung syllabically though still without metrical groupings. Parallel vocal parts at the intervals of a 4th or 5th are occasionally added.

In 'women's singing' the leadership role is assumed by two women who are known among members of their community to possess a special knowledge of the musical tradition, especially their ability to remember many melodies and texts and to render the songs successfully by improvising new lines. One leader beats a drum, the other a ṣaḥn (flat metal platter on which a small metal object is tapped). The rhythms produced on the drum determine the rhythmic pattern for a desired dance, while the playing of the ṣaḥn fixes its beat. There are four types of tunes: (1) a slow, opening tune with a simple rhythmic but non-metrical pattern, usually performed by one group of participants seated near the leaders in alternation with another group of women; (2) a dance – da'ase – in a seven-unit rhythmic metre and with tunes generated from an initial musical phrase for the first line of text and a concluding phrase for the second; (3) tunes in regular metre and with a fixed rhythmic pattern (ex.36), played immediately after the da'ase without a break in the drumming; (4) tunes in regular metre and with a fixed rhythmic pattern that includes syncopation (ex.37), also performed immediately after the previous dance without a break in the drumming. During the performance of the last three dances the tempos gradually accelerate and their melodies are sung at two dynamic levels: in sung phrases the drumming is less intense so that the words and the tune can be clearly heard; once the singing phrases end, the drummers immediately increase the volume and continue playing until the singer begins the next phrase. Another characteristic of women's singing is the ḥijer – long and high tones created using the head voice with ululation; one of the women begins ululating, and others immediately join her, continuing for some five to ten seconds. The ḥijer is performed especially during pauses between singing musical phrases.

(b) Iraq. Judeo-Arabic songs of the Jews of Iraq are associated with non-synagogal events, both religious and secular, generally related to annual and life cycles: the Pesaḥ seder ceremony celebrated at home, with each section of Hebrew or Aramaic text followed by the Judeo-Arabic translation; religious and secular pilgrimage songs particularly associated with the festival of Shabu'oth; women's songs for the prenuptial ḥenna ceremony; men's songs for wedding celebrations; and lullabies. The extant texts form a valuable record of Jewish life in Iraq, particularly during the 19th and 20th centuries.

The Judeo-Arabic language includes elements of local Arabic vernaculars and Hebrew. In folksongs it ranges from a literary vernacular or, more specifically in Iraq, literary Judeo-Baghdadi, to colloquial Judeo-Baghdadi, which is also spoken by many Jews elsewhere in Iraq. However, most folksongs in the repertory of the Jews of Iraq are composed in an Arabic dialect similar to that of local Muslim song (Avishur, 1987). Judeo-Arabic texts appear in Hebrew characters, either printed in block letters or handwritten in rashi-style characters. In addition to printed religious and semi-religious texts, many secular songs have survived in 19th-century manuscripts: a number of these are now reproduced in standard printed Hebrew (Avishur, 1987; 1990–91; 1994). The songs are also well known in the oral tradition and show the influence of Arab music.

The following music examples are drawn from the repertory of the Jews of Baghdad, the main centre of Iraqi Jewish life. Other Jewish centres, such as Basra, Al'Amārah, 'Ānāh, Mosul, Kirkūk and Khānaqīn, share this repertory with local variations. Ex.38 demonstrates the opening section of the Pesaḥ hagadah sung in (a) Aramaic and (b) a semi-literary Judeo-Arabic that mirrors the word rhythms of the Aramaic text. It is an unmetred song-like chant that is sung communally. The hagadah also includes metred song and narrative solo sections.

The piyyuṭ (Judeo-Arabic shbaḥ: 'praise song') Ṣuri ġo'ali yahh (Heb.: 'My rock, my redeemer is the Lord') serves as an introduction and chorus to the light-hearted, semi-religious Judeo-Arabic qunāgh ('way-station'; Shiloah, 1992, pp.167–8) songs, which map the route to the tomb of the Prophet Ezekiel, near Al Ḥillah, Iraq, or other holy sites in Israel. In a text of 1927 the author expresses a wish that the pilgrims ride in a ṭrāmbél (automobile). Earlier secular songs refer to pilgrims riding on a mule and other hardships encountered en route (Avishur, 1987, pp.163–92).

Some pilgrimage songs refer in later versions to bridegrooms and are classified in religious song books as pizmonim le-ḥathan ('bridegroom songs'; Mansour, 1953–4). The song Yānabi ('O prophet'; Manasseh, 1997, pp.90–91) and that shown in ex.39 were originally dedicated to the Prophet Ezekiel and Ezra the Scribe respectively. They are sung in colloquial Judeo-Arabic, to the igrug rhythm unique to Iraq. In Iraq these songs were performed by the abu shbaḥoth ('master of praises') who

Music for the ḥenna celebration before weddings was performed by the daqqāqa who sang and played the naqqāra (pair of small kettledrums) and a chorus of two or three women who each played a daff (frame drum with rattles). Most daqqāqa songs are in the igrug rhythm. With the virtual demise of their profession, their repertory is no longer associated solely with women's groups. All these songs remain in the Iraqi Jewish repertory, in Israel and elsewhere, though in changed circumstances. The relatively recent text of ex.41 (mixed Judeo-Arabic dialect and modern Israeli Hebrew) was composed in Israel after the mass emigration of Jews from Iraq (1950–51) and expresses the stark social conditions initially endured by the community in the abrupt transition to their new homeland.

(c) North Africa. The Jewish communities of the Maghrib (Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Libya) developed folksong repertories in Hebrew and in local Judeo-Arabic dialects. Two strikingly different groups of Maghribi Jews exist: those of large cities on the coasts who are influenced by urban musical styles and in the 20th century by modern trends of mainstream Middle Eastern Arab songs, and dwellers of remote inland areas such as the Atlas Mountains or the Sahara Desert who show Berber influences.

The folksong genres of urban Moroccan Jews include the malḥun and qaṣīdah sung by men, nuwwah (Arabic; mourning songs) and arubi and mawwāl sung by women. The most popular of these genres is the arubi. Performed at weddings, circumcisions, and other social gatherings such as the visit of an important guest, the arubi consists of five-line stanzas of ten syllables with fixed rhyme patterns (up to 50 stanzas). The melodies are adopted from a standard repertory which the singer adapts in the process of extemporizing the text. The topics of the arubi include love, the beauty of nature, the suffering and pain of loneliness, cursing of an enemy, and current events (e.g. a song cursing Adolf Hitler was composed during

Ex.41 Ash sawwét Ben Guryon, song in Baghdadi dialect and modern Hebrew (transcr. S. Manasseh from the LP recording, Shiloah and Avishur, 1988)

['That black plane – if only it hadn't brought us. It put doubt into us and we all came. What did you do, Ben Gurion? You worked us all up. We heard the propaganda and we came and dived straight in.']

World War II). The arubi takes the form of a dialogue between a man and a woman, and includes witty lines. The malḥun, with texts from the 16th century to the present, is based on modes and melodies from Andalusian music (see MOROCCO, §2(ii)). The songs treat social issues, ideological stands and historical events of the community.

Malḥun songs appeared in commercial recordings. Among the famous Jewish artists of this genre are Sami al-Maghribi and Zohara al-Fasiya. Social issues appear in the qaṣīdah, too, such as the L'qaṣīdah de-skhina which describes the preparation of the traditional meat-stew of the Sabbath. Maghribi Jewish songs, which combine Hebrew with Judeo-Arabic, are known as matruz. They treat religious and secular topics such as the praise of wine and the complaints of a poor teacher lacking funds for Pesaḥ.

Folksongs of the Jews from the Middle and High Atlas are characterized by pentatonic scales and responsorial and antiphonal styles of performance similar to Berber music. Men dance shoulder to shoulder, sometimes in lines or circles, and are accompanied by songs performed by a female soloist with a frame drum. These songs are performed at weddings and recall the Berber ahwash. The ziyyāra pilgrimage to the tomb sites of venerated saints is another important occasion for the performance of folksongs.

Robert Lachmann, in his survey of 1940 (repr. 1978), found that the Judeo-Arabic folksongs sung by Jewish women on the island of Djerba off the coast of Tunisia bear the musical characteristics of general Tunisian folk music genres.

The bulk of this repertory is connected with wedding events. The characteristic manner of performance is responsorial: a soloist accompanies herself with a darbukka (goblet-shaped drum), while a group, sitting around her, responds. Since the 1920s Jewish singers from Tunis (such as Habiba Mssika) excelled in the performance of popular songs based on folk elements, similar to the Moroccan malḥun.

(ii) Judeo-Spanish.

(a) Judeo-Spanish languages. The Spanish language spoken by Jews at the time of their expulsion from Spain in 1492 conformed not only to a variety of regional dialects spoken by the Christians, among whom they lived, but also embodied Hebrew, Aramaic and Arabic elements. The exiled Jews who established communities in the Eastern Mediterranean region (Ottoman Empire) also absorbed linguistic elements of other national populations (mainly Turkish, Greek and other Balkan tongues), whereas those who settled in Northern Morocco absorbed Arabic. It is these linguistic components that distinguish the Eastern from the Western Sephardim. From the mid-19th century, French and Italian had a decisive impact on the language of the Eastern Mediterranean Sephardim, as did Modern Andalusian Spanish on the speech of Sephardim in Morocco. English, Standard Spanish and Modern Hebrew tended to replace the traditional dialects of Sephardim who emigrated to North and South America after World War I, and to Israel after 1947. Though the language has been referred to as judezmo, koiné, spanyol in the Eastern realm and haketía in North Africa, Judeo-Spanish appears to have gained wide currency as the best term for both the pre- and post-exilic language. Ladino, another highly popular term, refers more precisely to the Spanish calque language that developed from the literal translation of Hebrew into Spanish.

Scholarly studies dealing with the various secular and paraliturgical musical genres rendered in Judeo-Spanish have appeared with increasing frequency since the 1980s. These studies have for the most part concerned orally transmitted materials (both sung and recited) that were collected and recorded among Sephardi informants of both Eastern and Western traditions residing in the USA, Canada, South America and Israel.

(b) The Iberian period. Jewish communities existed among the various populations of the Iberian Peninsula from at least the first millennium BCE until the expulsion of the Jews from Spain (1492) and from Portugal (1497), and doubtless shaped a secular culture quite separate from that of their Ashkenazi and Middle Eastern counterparts. Before the Islamic invasion of Spain in the early 8th century there were musical exchanges between Christians and Jews.

Medieval Spanish literature continues to be combed for information concerning Jewish musical practices. Jewish, together with Christian and Muslim musicians, participated in the varied performances of the Cantigas de Santa Maria produced at the Castilian court of Alfonso X el Sabio (1252–84), and sung in the Galician-Portuguese language. Whether Jews assisted in composing their melodies is not known. Although numerous Peninsular sources reveal the names of Jewish musicians, minstrels and poets, there is no evidence that they represented a manifestly Jewish musical tradition.

At the time of their expulsion, the Spanish Jews had incorporated many of the contemporary popular poetic and song genres such as the romance and the villancico into their secular music tradition. Yet, the extent to which their tradition reflected the varied musical styles and tastes current on the Peninsula and what remained of their Iberian tradition during the generations that followed may never be clear.

(c) The Sephardi diaspora. M.J. Benardete viewed the Sephardi diaspora as two waves of emigration, the medieval Jewish exiles and the Renaissance converts who sought to re-embrace Judaism. The former comprised those Jews who settled in North Africa and the Eastern Mediterranean region, where they continued as folk societies and preserved their Hispanic culture; the latter embraced those who settled in various parts of western Europe and North America and whose rapid Westernization led to the elimination of most traces of their Hispanic past.

Musicologists have focussed their attention on the Sephardi diaspora, particularly on the extant orally transmitted repertory of the widely scattered 20th-century Sephardi communities. Thus, it is mainly from Moroccan and Algerian communities of North Africa (particularly Tanger, Tétouan, Larache and Oran), and those of the Eastern Mediterranean region (particularly Sarajevo, Salonika (now Thessaloniki), Istanbul, Izmir, Edirne, Rhodes and Jerusalem) that most ethnographic information has been obtained. This information enabled modern investigators to characterize the musical heritage of the Sephardi diaspora not only as a collective entity but also as regionally distinct groups. Moreover, a distinction may now be drawn between those elements that persisted since pre-Expulsion times and those that were borrowed from the peoples among whom the Sephardim settled after their exile from Spain.

(d) The Romancero. An important genre of Sephardi secular poetry and music is the Judeo-Spanish Romancero. This tradition represents an early stage in the development of the Spanish ballad, not only in its 15th-century Castilian lexical and phonological features, but also in its retention of numerous ballad themes current in medieval Spanish balladry. Also included in the Sephardi ballad repertory are themes from medieval French sources, events from Spanish history, subject matter from the Bible and classical antiquity, and a variety of adventures that blend lyric and narrative elements. The Judeo-Spanish branch also shares numerous themes with the pan-Hispanic (Spanish, Portuguese and Catalan) Romancero.

In its typical form, the romance embodies a 16-syllable verse divided by a medial pause into two octosyllabic hemistichs, the former without rhyme, the latter rhyming in assonance. The romancillo comprises two hexasyllabic hemistichs. Both are sung to strophic tunes with the quatrain strophe predominating.

Sephardi ballad scholarship begins with the Catálogo del romancero judío-español (1906) by R. Menéndez Pidal (1869–1968), which listed over 140 ballad themes current among the Sephardim in their diasporic communities. Since then, numerous scholars have been actively collecting and studying Judeo-Spanish ballads, among whom M. Alvar, P. Bénichou, R. Benmayor, D. Catalán and A. Librowicz have sought out collaborators to provide musical transcriptions for their publications. Since 1959, through the collaboration of S.G. Armistead, J.H. Silverman and I.J. Katz there has been more systematic fieldwork involving the collecting and editing of texts and tunes with the aid of recording equipment in the USA, Israel and North Africa. Menéndez Pidal's Catálogo has been superseded by Armistead's Catálogo-índice (1978).

A detailed survey of musicological research focussing on the Judeo-Spanish Romancero from about 1900 to the early 1960s was published by Katz in 1972, and subsequent musicological fieldwork has been undertaken by E.N. Alberti-Kleinbort, J.R. Cohen, E. Gerson-Kiwi, A. Petrović and S. Weich-Shahak. Among composers and musicians, A. Hemsi, L. Algazi and I. Levy collected and incorporated ballad tunes in their musical anthologies. M. Manrique de Lara, a close associate of Menéndez Pidal, conducted earlier fieldwork in the Balkans and Middle East (1911–12), and in northern Morocco (1915–16), during which time he gathered almost 2000 ballad texts and transcribed over 450 tunes directly from oral tradition. Decades later, A. de Larrea Palacín (1952) collected 270 texts and 285 tunes from the ballad tradition of Tétouan, Morocco. Interestingly, the earliest notations we possess for Judeo-Spanish ballad tunes were made by L. Kuba, in Sarajevo, 13 years prior to Menéndez Pidal's Catálogo (Weich-Shahak, 1979–80).

Well over a century after the Expulsion there was still active communication between the exiled Sephardim and the Iberian Peninsula. During this period, the most popular ballads from Spain continued to circulate throughout the greater Mediterranean region. By the late 1600s, however, contact with Spain became increasingly sporadic, particularly in the Eastern Mediterranean region where relations among the varied Sephardi communities were slowly disintegrating, thus marking the beginning of the ballad's decline. Numerous Castilian ballad books and broadsides made their way to the Moroccan Sephardi communities, and from these sources and from the headnotes in the Hebrew hymnals published in Amsterdam, Venice, Istanbul, Salonika and Safed (*c*1525–1819) those ballads that were current at that time have been inventoried and categorized. Their headnotes cited the initial verses (incipits) of ballads and other songs (in Spanish, Arabic and Turkish) whose tunes were widely known and which served as tune indicators for the hymns to which they were sung. This practice (contrafactum), already known in Spain among the Hebrew poets (payṭanim) who created liturgical hymns (piyyuṭim) during the Golden Age of Hispano-Hebraic poetry, had its ancient origin in the Book of Psalms. Here follows an example (ex.42) of the ballad tune for La vuelta del marido, which served as a tune contrafact for the popular liturgical hymn Adon 'olam.

To whatever degree each community strove to maintain the tunes associated with ballad incipits, their replacement by tunes from the new surroundings must have begun a century after the Expulsion. Essential stylistic differences in the individual ballad repertories of the Eastern Mediterranean and Moroccan Sephardi communities began to appear on textual levels, while even greater divergences emerged in the music.

While research to date has not yet traced extant ballad tunes back to 15th-or 16th-century Peninsular sources in cancionero and vihuela collections, romanticized notions have continued to characterize the diaspora tunes accompanying known Iberian ballad texts as 'traditional Hispanic melodies'. A novel, but unconvincing, attempt to link ballad tunes from the extant tradition with the aforementioned collections has been undertaken by J. Etzion and S. Weich-Shahak (1988). Furthermore, the stylistic differences between the ballads of the Eastern and Western tradition, and the possibility of identifying tune families have been discussed by Katz (1968; 1988) and Etzion and Weich-Shahak (1988; 1993).

(e) The copla. Another important genre that has lately been studied in greater depth is the Judeo-Spanish copla (var. compla, kompla) highly favoured among the Eastern Sephardim. Deriving its subject matter from biblical stories, Jewish history and tradition, and contemporary events, the copla has also been used to impart communal values. Composed, for the most part, in octosyllabic quatrains, it was suited to strophic melodies that were current in surrounding regional and local cultures.

Coplas were printed on pliegos impresos (broadsides) and circulated throughout the Eastern Sephardi diaspora, especially in Salonika and Istanbul. Thus, the copla circulated more as a written tradition than an exclusively oral one. In Salonika, in particular, it enjoyed continuous popularity throughout the 17th and 18th centuries.

Sung mainly in private homes, the coplas comprised a large repertory of paraliturgical songs for celebrating the more festive Holy Days of the Jewish religious calendar and for commemorating various stages of the life cycle (i.e. circumcision, weddings etc.). Unlike the Romancero tradition, cultivated principally by women, coplas were sung primarily by men. Their texts are also rich in Hebrew, Turkish and Greek lexical items.

(f) Lyric songs. Canticas or cantigas, as they are known among the Eastern Sephardim, or cantares or cantes among the Western, constitute the richest and most variegated repertory of the three genres discussed here and embody vestiges of pre-Expulsion popular Peninsular poetry. M. Attias (1972), traced its history from the Expulsion to modern times with ample textual documentation. Interestingly, Attias pointed out that from the end of the 18th century until the first half of the 19th, liturgical songs in Judeo-Spanish were more dominant than secular songs, which, like the romances, were on the decline. M. Alvar's pathfinding study (1971) uncovered numerous survivals of pre-1492 metrical patterns and poetic conventions in the Moroccan Judeo-Spanish wedding songs.

Unlike the romances and coplas, the lyric texts focus on more universal themes, the predominant category being love songs. In the Eastern tradition, many texts are translations of Turkish and Greek songs. Sung mainly as octosyllabic quatrains to strophic tunes, they also exhibit musical structures that vary considerably from those of the romances and coplas. Many of them contain estribillos (refrains). In general, lyric songs are shorter than ballads and coplas, and their themes are appropriate to all stages of the life cycle. Among the love songs, the şarkis combine consecutive stanzas of diverse origin that are thematically unrelated. Songs of this type are also popular among the Turks and Arabs.

(g) Music in secular life. An overview of the musical traditions of Sephardi secular life must take into account the life cycle and liturgical calendar, for both are richly endowed with songs. Accompanying the various events of the life cycle there are lullabies, children's songs, love songs, wedding songs and dirges. Endechas (dirges) are sung at funerals and during the week preceding Tish'ah be-av (the 9th day of the Hebrew month of Av, commenorating the destruction of the Temple). Romances have permeated all facets of secular life, and some, because of their elegiac subject matter, have entered the endecha repertory. Religious occasions (e.g. circumcisions, bar-mitzvahs and weddings) and gatherings on Holy Days (e.g. the Passover seder, Ḥanukkah and Purim) permit the singing of secular songs. Weddings predominate as the most elaborate of all the ceremonies, whose varied stages involve not only vocal but also instrumental music. Sung by individuals or groups of singers, lyric songs were, at times, accompanied by the pandero (shallow, circular single-headed frame drum).

(iii) Yiddish and central European languages.

(a) Ashkenazi Europe. The folk music of Ashkenazi Europe is both unified and differentiated by the history and languages of central and eastern Europe. Historical issues are essential to understanding Ashkenazi folk music, for Jewish folk music, like 'folk music' in general, is the product of changing ideas about music, what it represents, and how it functions, which in the case of Ashkenazi Jews must also be understood as products of Europe and European concepts of music.

During the initial central European phase of Ashkenazi culture, traditional music already fitted the social structures and institutions of the Jewish presence in German-speaking Europe. Private and public religious practices provided a setting for folk music, not least because of the predominance of oral traditions. The urban cultures of medieval Jewish cities contrasted with rural folk traditions, just as local repertories were distinct from regional traditions and those practised by all Jews. Jewish traditional music, moreover, embraced practices unique to the Jewish community and those from surrounding, non-Jewish cultures.

The core of Jewish culture in the Rhine valley was frequently subjected to acts of prejudice and violence, but in the 14th century several major pogroms forced the Rhineland Jews into eastern Europe. Still retaining the Middle High German of the medieval Rhineland, with an essential complement of Hebrew words and orthography, the Jews of eastern Europe established new centres of culture where the Yiddish language developed and became the basis for east European Jewish folksong. The history of Ashkenazi folk music, therefore, unfolded from the schism between central and eastern Europe, and reflects the relation between these two parts of Europe until the present.

Distinctions of genre in Ashkenazi folk music result from religious and aesthetic distinctions between vocal and instrumental music. Vocal music, or folksong, contains more privileged genres because vocal music receives more approbation in religious attitudes about music. Religio-aesthetic judgment places folksong closer to the core of the community, not least because of the anchoring role of texts in Hebrew and Yiddish dialects. Folksong genres often reflect the polyglot nature of traditional Jewish society. Instrumental music often accompanies less strictly Jewish activities, such as dance, which has a much older presence in European communities than usually realized. At least as early as the Middle Ages, Rhineland communities could claim dance halls, where leytsonim (instrumental musicians) performed, perhaps the forerunners of klezmer musicians who first appear in the Early Modern Era (see §IV, 3(ii) below; see also Salmen, 1991).

Other concepts of genre reflect other functions, repertories and social structures in Ashkenazi Europe. Early 20th-century scholars (e.g. A.Z. Idelsohn and J. Schönberg) regarded synagogue song as 'folklike', especially when it used melodic and modal materials from folksong. Ḥasidic genres have developed in eastern Europe and spread throughout the Diaspora and to Israel with the mystical and ecstatic traditions of the practitioners (Vinaver, 1985). There are also genres that admit to the presence of outside traditions, but also stress their integration into Jewish uses and functions.

Though the settings and contexts for Ashkenazi music in Europe fall into two major categories, secular and religious, Ashkenazi folk music often bridges these categories and negotiates between them. Family traditions depend on religious repertories, such as zemirot, performed most frequently at Sabbath meals; zemirot have Hebrew texts and follow oral tradition, but they regularly borrow melodic material from other sources. Synagogue song in both central and eastern Europe regularly borrows from secular and sacred sources, Jewish and non-Jewish, which are then moulded into liturgies that undergo variation in a manner similar to secular folksong.

Secular contexts for folk music are present in both private and public spheres. Much Yiddish folksong in the home, for example, reflects the responses of women to life events, child-rearing and challenges to the family from non-Jewish society (e.g. conscription of sons into the army). Dance, both as a component of Holy Days such as mid-winter Purim, with its Purimball, and as an accompaniment to wedding celebrations, takes place in settings that cross the boundaries between sacred and secular. The folk music of political and ideological movements reconfigure Jewish traditions for functions in a changing public sphere. Accordingly, repertories of ḥasidic songs (Vinaver, 1985) and Zionist songs (Taich, 1906; Glaser, 1914) disseminated Jewish folk music to Jewish communities throughout Europe and the Diaspora. Finally, the stage is an important setting for folk music, which constantly interacts with popular music in Ashkenazi traditions (Slobin, Tenement Songs, 1982).

References to Jewish folk-music specialists appear in both Jewish and non-Jewish sources as early as the 12th century. Specialists have most often been instrumentalists within the Jewish community, for example klezmer musicians, or they have performed at events where instrumental music was necessary. Specialization and professionalism in Jewish folk music characterize domains in which the acceptability of music-making may be questionable, especially in more Orthodox communities. Folk-music specialists effectively assume responsibility for many forms of secular music-making, thereby negotiating the conceptual barriers between secular and sacred musical practices. The presence of badḥanim (Yiddish badkhónim) at weddings reflects the ways in which they were once ritual specialists and tricksters.

Records documenting payment to folk-music professionals often reveal considerable mobility and frequent interaction with non-Jewish musicians (notably Roma musicians) and events (especially dances), both of which accounted for processes of exchange within regions and between central and east European folk-music traditions. In many areas, specialists provided music for folk drama or for wandering dramatic troupes. Within such historical contexts, Jewish folk musicians found their way to cabaret and popular stages in central Europe and to Yiddish theatres in eastern Europe (see below, §IV, 2(iii) (b)).

Specialization increasingly characterized the musicians of the synagogue in the wake of the haskalah (Jewish enlightenment). The ḥazzan not only won a place for his performances in the religious life of a community, but he also often contributed to secular traditions, both Jewish and non-Jewish. Ḥazzanim, moreover, moved from synagogue to synagogue, transforming melodic traditions and repertories through the introduction of new styles and the alteration of old ones. Cantors such as A.Z. Idelsohn were among those earlier 20th-century specialists who consciously collected and adapted folk traditions from Jewish communities throughout the world for the creation of new, international canons of Jewish folk music.

As a result of transformations in Jewish identity during the 19th and 20th centuries, there was growing interaction between folksong and other domains of music-making, within the Jewish community and without. Oral traditions in central European synagogues incorporated melodic and formal materials from secular and non-Jewish traditions, transforming these into new sacred identities. Collections of Jewish folk music appeared in published form and were then disseminated by the beginning of the 20th century, serving as the basis for growing attempts to compose new works based on Jewish folk melodies (e.g. Loewe, 1894; Ginsburg and Marek, 1901/R; Grunwald, 1924–5).

A recognizably European Jewish folk music had therefore emerged to form distinctive repertories and canons by the 20th century, and this Jewish folk music took its place alongside other national traditions whose roots could be philologically traced and whose distinctive representation of modern history grew from both textual and contextual uniqueness. As European Jews began to settle in the Yishuv, the Jewish community of modern Ereṣ Yisrael ('land of Israel'), a new historical phase emerged in which Hebrew folksongs and folk dances took their place within European collections next to German or Yiddish repertories. Folk music responded to 20th-century modernism and internationalism by representing Jewish identity in even more complex and diverse ways (Bohlman, 1989; Nathan, 1994).

Despite the massive destruction of Jewish communities during the Holocaust, Jewish folk music has gradually but steadily gained a new presence, albeit with radically different functions and roles. In many areas of eastern Europe, folk music was inaudible as Jewish communities maintained low public profiles. Professional musicians may have participated in other ethnic and national traditions, whereas the oral traditions of synagogue music preserved folk-influenced liturgies while membership dwindled through death and emigration. In the first decades after the Holocaust, until the 1960s new anthologies appeared as means of memorializing the Holocaust, but these also provided a store of Jewish folksongs for the German folk-music revival in the 1960s and 70s, and for the use of some east European state ensembles in the 1970s and 80s.

In the 1990s the folk music of Ashkenazi Europe underwent a widespread revival. New collections of older repertories (Lemm, 1992; Freund and others, 1992) complement fieldwork and the discovery of Jewish musicians who survived the Cold War era. Many east European Jews, especially Poles and Russians, have emigrated to Austria and Germany, where they introduced Eastern Ashkenazi traditions into religious and sacred practices of central European communities. Klezmer ensembles, with and without Jewish members, proliferated, and folk-music ensembles of all kinds included Jewish dances in their repertories. Historical and modern recordings juxtaposed Ashkenazi folk music in a post-modern mix, transforming it to a widely disseminated form of 'world music', that is, international popular music. With different functions but many of the same historical contradictions, the folk music of Jewish Europe continues to represent the changes in and challenges to Jewish communities throughout the world.

(b) Composed song and Yiddish theatre. Music composed to Yiddish-language texts in the form of composed song and music for the theatre is a phenomenon of the later 19th century and is related to the contemporaneous European nationalist movements. Theatre music first appeared with the creations of Abraham Goldfaden (1840–1908), an itinerant writer and performer who established the first professional Yiddish theatre company, in 1876 in Iaşi, Romania. Goldfaden's touring companies were enthusiastically supported by the east European Jewish masses, and gave rise to a proliferation of rival organizations. Untrained in music but with an ear for adaptable melodies, Goldfaden drew on and borrowed a variety of sources for use in his self-authored stage productions, including synagogal chants, Jewish and Slavonic folksongs and dances, and west European operatic and popular music. While Goldfaden never fully consolidated these influences, the composers who followed him were able to fashion a musical idiom from his legacy suited to the emerging Yiddish theatre. Important features of this style were already present in Goldfaden's work, most notably the conjoining of musical and literary motifs from east European Jewish folk culture with Western harmonic and formulaic procedures. An illustration of this process may be found in Goldfaden's popular lullaby, 'Rozhenkes mit mandlen' (Yiddish: 'Raisins and Almonds'), from the 1882 operetta Shulamith. The song's poetic subject descends from a cluster of Yiddish folkloric cradle songs using the phrase 'raisins and almonds'; its minor-mode melody stems from a different source in Jewish folksong. Goldfaden composed an original text around the folk motif and adapted the folk melody to 3/4 waltz time.

Goldfaden's most important successor in theatrical composition was Joseph Rumshinsky (1881–1956), a conservatory-educated musician with a professional background in liturgical, choral and stage music. Born in Russian Lithuania, Rumshinsky emigrated to the USA in 1904 and eventually settled in New York City, which had by that time become the world centre of Yiddish theatre because of the Tsarist ban on public performance in Yiddish throughout the Russian empire. Rumshinsky's early productions, often in collaboration with the actor and impresario Boris Thomashefsky, included several large-scale operettas. These works, modelled after European light opera, mark an advance over Goldfaden's idiom with respect to stylistic unity and professional polish; they also reflect, in their opulent production values, the spectacular success of the American Yiddish theatre during the first decades of the 20th century. The 1916 production Tsubrokhene fidele ('The Broken Violin'), for example, called for a pit orchestra of near symphonic dimensions. Under Rumshinsky, music for the Yiddish stage underwent a process of Americanization: European light opera style gradually yielded to Tin Pan Alley fashions and formulae (see §V, 2(vi) below). This trend increased after World War I when the American-born children of immigrants began to make up an important segment of the theatre-going public. The influence of American popular music on compositions for the Yiddish stage may be located in form (verse/refrain), structure (4×8-measure phrase units), style (syncopated melodies) and content (American themes and vocabulary within song texts).

With the compositions of Rumshinsky and his younger colleagues, particularly Alexander Olshanetsky (1892–1946), Sholom Secunda (1894–1947) and Abraham Ellstein (1907–63), Yiddish theatre music had reached the apex of its popularity by the late 1920s to early 1930s. The works of these songwriters represent the genre's classic phase. Olshanetsky was prized for his artful harmonies and Russian-Gypsy melos, Secunda for a directness reminiscent of folksong (two of his songs, 'Bay mir bistu sheyn' and 'Dona, dona' became crossover hits), and Ellstein for bringing the vitality of jazz and swing music to Yiddish popular song. By the 1920s, American Yiddish music had an international following, as performers toured venues in Canada, Latin America, Europe, South Africa and Australia. The style was particularly well received in many Polish cities, where the Yiddish theatre, re-established in independent Poland, had begun to institute post-Goldfaden conventions of its own. Music for the Yiddish stage in Poland and the former Soviet Union has attracted little scholarly attention (see, however, Fater, 1970; Pamietnik teatralny, xli, 1992; Michalik and Prokop-Janiec, 1995).

The 'golden age' of Yiddish theatre music coincided paradoxically with the decline of the American Yiddish stage, whose patronage by the late 1920s dwindled as a result of restrictive US immigration policies and the assimilation of its patrons into the American cultural mainstream. The theatre's decline led to a refinement of the style, as songwriters responded increasingly to the demands of the recording industry, radio and dance halls. A noteworthy aspect of this later phase is the ethnic coding evident in many songs, accomplished through selective use of the melodic augmented 2nd. This device, adopted from traditional cantillation modes, was already quite common in Yiddish theatre music. However, during the genre's final stage of development, the augmented 2nd interval also took on a symbolic function, which, together with a minor-key melody (and, of course, the Yiddish text), effectively established a song's pedigree for its increasingly assimilated audience. After World War II, the altered social circumstances of its Jewish American patron base, in addition to the extermination of its parent culture during the Nazi Holocaust, spelt an end to the great creative phase of the America Yiddish theatre.

The origin of Yiddish composed song (art song) may be traced to the 1897 meeting in the Moscow hotel room of composer Joel Engel (1868–1927) and Russian music critic Vladimir Stasov, during which the nationalist Stasov challenged Engel to seek musical inspiration in his own Jewish heritage. Engel and several colleagues soon set to work, publishing in 1901 a landmark anthology of Yiddish folksong texts (Evreskaya Narodnaya Pesnya v Russie, ed. Dinsburg and Marek) and founding in 1908 the Jewish Folk Music Society (with branches in St Petersburg, Moscow and elsewhere), whose chief objectives were the collection, harmonization and publication of Jewish folksongs and the creation of 'art' compositions based on the content or spirit of these materials. During its ten-year existence, the Society subsidized numerous publications, among them many songs composed to texts drawn from folk poetry or from the works of contemporary Yiddish writers. Apart from Engel, important contributors to the nascent repertory included Ephraim Shkliar (1871–?1942), Solomon Rosowsky (1878–1962), Lazare Saminsky (1882–1959), Mikhail Gniessen (1883–1957), Alexander Krein (1883–1951), Joseph Achron (1886–1943) and Moses Milner (1886–1953). When the Society disbanded in the wake of the Russian Revolution, many members relocated to the West where they continued to propagate the cause of Jewish musical nationalism.

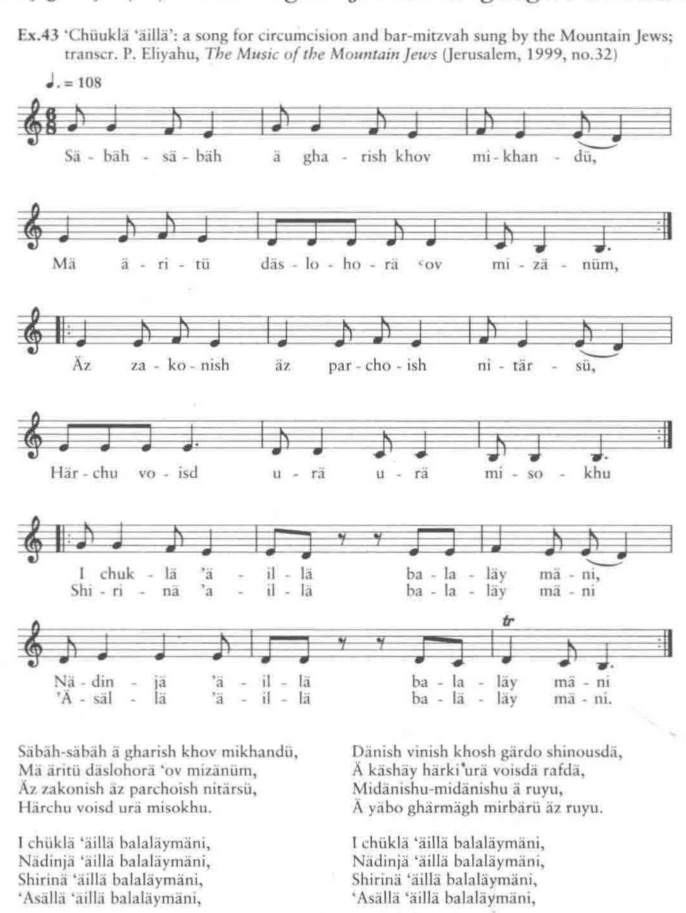
The work of the St Petersburg Jewish Folk Music Society composers derived from the Russian Romantic tradition epitomized by Rimsky-Korsakov, the group's mentor at the St Petersburg Conservatory. As it developed and spread, however, the genre attracted composers of various backgrounds and styles: Yiddish texts, therefore, rather than any particular set of stylistic features, remain the defining element of this repertory. By the 1920s, Yiddish art songs were being published and performed in the USA and Latin America as well as many European nations. Composers prominent in the post-Engel generation include: Samuel Bugatch (1898–1984), Michel Gelbart (1889–1962), Vladimir Heifetz (1894–1970), Henech Kon (1890–1972), Solomon Golub (1887–1952), Leo Low (1878–1960), Maurice Rauch (1910–94), Jacob Schaeffer (1888–1936) and Lazar Weiner (1897–1982), all in the USA; Leon Wajner (1898–1979) in Argentina; Shaul Berezovski (1908–1975) in Israel; and Solomon Fayntukh (1899–1985), Leyb Yampolsky (1889–1972) and Zinovii Kompaneetz (1902–87) in the former Soviet Union.

The earliest publications of the St Petersburg Jewish Folk Music Society included artful arrangements of Yiddish theatre pieces erroneously ascribed as folksongs. With the passing of time, the distinction between 'theatre' and 'composed' song has grown increasingly artificial. Many performers presently regard the enduring melodies of both categories as equal in the heritage of Jewish national song.

(iv) Central and South Asian languages. Jews spread eastwards at the time of the First Temple exile and settled in the Caucasus, Central Asia, Iran and India. In each location they created a folklore in local Jewish dialects which, musically, has strong ties with the surrounding non-Jewish cultures. The folk music of these Jews has been studied only sporadically.

Of the two major Jewish castes that coexisted in Cochin along the coast of Malabar (state of Kerala), the Malabari or black Jews and the Paradesi or white Jews, only the former developed a local folksong repertory. Malabari women sing folksongs in Malayalam, a dialect of Tamil from Kerala. Some of these songs date to the 13th century and were transmitted by oral tradition. They treat Jewish themes, such as the blessing of Abraham, mythological figures (e.g. Evarayi, the wise man from Jerusalem), stories about the origins of their community and lyrical topics.



The Kurdish Jews (mostly from Iraq) sing in a dialect of Aramaic known as Lishna Yahudyya or Lashon ha-Targum of Jebali, as well as in the local Kurdish language, Kurmanji. The singing of ballads and folk epics is a distinctive feature of Kurdish Jewish culture, a common heritage of Jews and Muslims in this region. Two biblical epics sung in Aramaic are the stories of Joseph and of David and Goliath. These songs are strophic with a refrain and rhythmically flowing. Most songs of this genre, however, are in Kurmanji. Folksongs are also performed to accompany folkdances of three types: open-half circle and line dances with arms linked tightly, diwanki (solo dances) and dancing in processions. The dances, accompanied by a dola-zirne ensemble, are performed successively without interruption. Songs are responsorial or antiphonal with the lead singer facing the line of singers. Dances are associated with the songs they accompany. Diwanki are performed at home during evening gatherings for the purpose of entertaining. Stories, songs, instrumental tunes and virtuoso solo dancing were performed while the public sat in a circle. Procession dances are performed by individuals. They occur mainly during the bar-mitzvah and wedding ceremonies along the way from the synagogue to the home.

The Mountain Jews from the eastern and northern Caucasus developed a rich folksong repertory in Juhuri, their vernacular language, and in Azeri. There are two musical traditions: därbandi (northern Azerbaijan, southern Daghestan up to Khäytogh) and khäytoghi (Khäytogh, northern Daghestan, Chechen Republic and Kabardino-Balkaria). Before the Mountain Jews settled in large cities in the early 20th century they were an agricultural society that depended on the changing of seasons, and they marked the routine of nature with rituals of pagan or Zoroastrian origins which include shä'mä vasal (spring ritual) songs and gudil gudil (songs for rain). Lullabies improvised by mothers and grandmothers while rocking babies describe their wishful thoughts regarding the future of the child. Mä'nihoy 'ärüsi (wedding songs) comprise the bulk of the folksong repertory. They are performed with instrumental accompaniment by semi-professional singers and are influenced by the modes, rhythms and forms of Azerbaijani art and popular music. Ex.43 is a circumcision and bar-mitzvah song performed by the Mountain Jews.

Folk stories of epic content (e.g. sections from the Persian epos Irani-pehlevi) or episodes of the local Jewish history (e.g. the recruiting of Mountain Jews to the Russian Army after the conquest of the eastern Caucasus in the mid-19th century) are sung by professional male singers (ovosunächi or mä'nikhun in Juhuri or ashugh in Azerbaijani) at homes, the centre of the Jewish quarter or the synagogue. Giryä (laments) are sung by women at the home of the deceased during the seven days of mourning. Singers of giryä-khundä have prominent status owing to their knowledge of this repertory. The highly metaphorical texts and the melody are improvised responsorially between a solo singer and chorus of mourners. As the days of mourning pass and the songs are repeated incessantly, they acquire a fixed form.

Songs in Persian appear in manuscripts as early as the 14th century, when the Jewish poet Shaheen was active. His songs continued to be performed up to the modern era. Other Persian Jewish poets are Amrani, Biniyamin ben Mishael and Siman Tov Melamed. Songs were preserved in the dastakh, a manuscript pocket book owned by singers. In certain areas of Iran (particularly Shiraz) the Jews distinguished themselves as musicians and also served the Muslim society, such as Isaac under Nasser al-Din Shah (1848–96) and the singer Yonah Dardashti (b ?1905) (see §V, 1 below).

Ex.43 'Chüuklä 'äillä': a song for circumcision and bar-mitzvah sung by the Mountain Jews; transcr. P. Eliyahu, The Music of the Mountain Jews (Jerusalem, 1999, no.32)

Wedding songs are close in their structure to the Persian Tarane-hai mahali. They consist of short phrases repeated many times based on motifs of selected dastgāh. In addition to the general Jewish Persian repertory, there are local songs of individual communities, such as Isfahan and Mashhad.

The repertory of the Bukharan Jews (Samarkand, Bukhara, Tashkent and Dushanbe) includes traditional songs in Persian, Uzbek and Tajik. Some genres have a specific function as the gakhvorabandon (putting the newborn into a special cradle), koshchinon (ritual painting of a bride's eyebrows) and haqqoni (laments). At weddings and other celebrations professional female Jewish singers-/dancers perform elaborated dances from the sozanda genre.

3. Instrumental music.

(i) The Islamic world. Jewish musicians were of particular importance in the performance and composition of instrumental music throughout the Islamic world, despite their lowly status both among Muslims and within their own communities. Jewish ensembles, sometimes including non-Jewish musicians or accompanying Muslim male and female singers, perpetuated the repertories from the various classical music traditions in North Africa, the Middle East, Iraq, the Caucasus, Iran and Central Asia, serving as agents of musical exchange between the different regions of the Islamic world. In most cases Jewish ensembles served both Jewish and Muslim audiences at life-cycle events (notably weddings) and for pure entertainment (e.g. playing in coffeehouses and private residences). Although 'Jewish musicians' in the present context generally refers to male performers and composers, there are cases of Jewish women who crossed the boundaries of their traditional community confines and became performers of instrumental music in Jewish and, more rarely, non-Jewish events (see §V, 1(i) below).

Jewish musicians were active in the practice of the Arabic-Andalusian music traditions in Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia. In earlier periods there is evidence of gentiles performing instrumental music for Jews in North Africa – as Rabbi Abraham Ibn Musa (*c*1680–1733) testified (GB-Lbl Add.440, f.164*v*):

> I witnessed a scandal ... [Jews from Tunis] bring to their houses on Holy Days, and sometimes on weekdays, gentiles that play kinnor (kamanja) and nevel ('ūd) and tof (drum, probably ṭār) and ḥalil (wind instrument, perhaps the ghayṭa) ... and men intermingle with women.

However, since the 19th century Jewish instrumentalists appear to have attained prominence, as testified by travellers such as the Italian Jew Samuel Romanelli and the French painter Eugène Delacroix, as well as by the evident esteem with which the Sultans (e.g. 'Abd al-'Azīz; ruled 1894–1908) regarded Jewish musicians.

The cities of Marrakech and Mogador in particular have a history of Jewish performers of al-'alā al-andalusiyya (Moroccan-Andalusian music). Among the famous ensembles from Marrakech in the early 20th century was the Arba'a al-kbīra (Arabic: 'large' or 'double four', because it included twice the number of each instrument: 'ūd, rabāb, Western viola, and ṭār) led by Samuel ben Dahan. In Mogador the leading ensemble was that of Yosef Zdidi, whose musicians were trained by the Muslim master Mahdī Ibn Ṣūṭa (Ben Ami, 1970). Jews were also active in the perpetuation of Andalusian musical traditions. In Algeria the Jewish musician, publisher and impresario Edmond-Nathan Yafil (1877–1928) founded the musical society al-Muṭribiyya and was considered a central figure in the renaissance of Algerian-Andalusian music (Bouzar-Kasbadji, 1980, pp.39–86). Among the Jewish masters of the Algerian nūba in the 20th century has been Saud El Medioni, also called Saoud l'Oranais. Later, instrumentalists such as Raymond Leyris and Sylvain Ghrenassia continued to excel in the performance of the Algerian-Andalusian tradition. Jewish and Muslim Arab musicians were still sharing performances in North Africa in the 1970s (e.g. on the Isle of Djerba, Tunisia; see Davis, 1999). The peace process in the Middle East has allowed for a renewal in the relations between Moroccan Muslim and Jewish musicians, with mutual exchanges and performances being staged in Israel and Morocco.

Ottoman Jewish musicians from Constantinople (Istanbul), Edirne, Salonika and Izmir were involved in the development of Ottoman classical music from the early 17th century. Among them were the miskalî (player of the miskal, an Ottoman panpipe) Yahudi Yako and the tanburî (player of the string instrument tanbur) Yahudi Kara Kash, and the composers Çelebiko (an instructor of the famous Ottoman musician Prince Cantemir), Moshe Faro (known as Musi or Tanburî Ḥakham Mushe, d 1776) a leading musician at the court of Sultan Mahmud I, Aharon Hamon (known as Yahudi Harun, d after 1721), and Isaac Fresco Romano (known as Tanburî Isḥāq, 1745–*c*1814), who was the most prominent Jewish musician of the Ottoman Empire and who served at the court of Sultan Selim III. Among the distinguished Jewish musicians and composers of more recent generations in Turkey were Shem Tov Shikiar (1840–1920), from Izmir, and Abraham Levy Hayyat (Missirli Ibrahim, b 1881), who was active in Istanbul.

In Iraq Jews were conversant in all musical genres and played a particularly important role in the development of the traditional maqām 'irāqī in the 19th and 20th centuries (Warkow, 1986). The instrumental ensemble established by Jewish musicians, called al-schālghī al-baghdādī, consisted of a singer (qāri' al-maqām) accompanied by a santūr (a version of the Persian 72-string box zither played with two wooden sticks), jūza or al-kamāna al-baghdādiyya (3- or 4-string spike fiddle), dumbuk (clay drum) and daff (small frame drum with metal discs). More modern ensembles incorporated the Western violin, qānūn, nay and 'ūd. At the International Congress of Arabic Music held in Cairo in 1932 the official Iraqi delegation included many Jews. They were led by the famous 'awād ('ūd player) Ezra Aharon ('Azzūrī Effendi) who was involved in the introduction of 'modern' (i.e. Egyptian) music to Iraq. Another prominent Iraqi Jewish musician of that period was the violinist and composer Ṣalāḥ al-Kuwaytī, a founding member of the Iraqi Radio Orchestra in 1936. Aharon left Iraq for Palestine in 1934 to become a leading figure in the development of modern Arab music in Israel/Palestine and the leader of the 'Oriental' Orchestra of the British-sponsored Palestinian Broadcasting Authority (later Kol yisrael, the Israeli Radio); the orchestra included Jewish immigrants from Iraq and Egypt as well as local Muslim and Christian Arab musicians (Warkow, 1987).

In the Kurdish territories of Iraq, Jews shared the instrumental repertory for zurna (double reedpipe) and doira (large barrel drum that hangs from the shoulder and is played with sticks) with their Muslim counterparts. This instrumental music accompanies group dancing at Jewish weddings and other family celebrations (Squires, 1975).

In Iran (Persia) Jews played a substantial role in the conception and transmission of instrumental art and folk music. This phenomenon was particularly noticeable in Shiraz (Loeb, 1972). A census of 1903 counted 60 professional Jewish instrumentalists and singers in this community of 5000. Jewish experts on the Persian dastgāh are known by name from the late 19th century. The kamancha virtuoso Musa-Khan Kashani (1856–1939), who served under Prince Thal Al-Sultan, was considered one of the great creative geniuses of Persian classical music. In the 20th century the outstanding Jewish musician was Mortaza Ney-Davud (*b c*1904), a disciple of Aqa Huseyn-Qoli and Darwish-Khan, who recorded his radif in the 1970s on behalf of the Iranian government (Netzer, 1984).

In the Caucasus, from Baku to Nalchick, it was customary for Muslims to engage musicians from the Mountain Jews to play at their festivities (Eliyahu, 1999). The music profession was handed down from one generation to the next within families, and therefore the Jewish ensembles consisted of relatives. Among the musical genres performed by Jews are sections of the Azeri and Daghestani mugam repertory, with a marked preference for the modes bayati shiraz, segah, mahur hindi, chargah and shur. Suites consisting of a mugam (improvised section), täsnif ('song') and räng ('dance') are regularly played at weddings. Among the outstanding Mountain Jewish musicians were the garmoshka (Asiatic accordion) virtuoso Shamil Navakhov (1920–81) and the members of the Avdalimov and Izrailov ensembles from Derbent.

The instrumental music of Jews from Azerbaijan and southern Daghestan is mainly associated with dances, such as täräkämä, ovshori and khars. Täräkämä melodies are performed by a leading instrument (e.g. zurnov, tar or komonchä) accompanied by a dämkäsh (playing a bourdon) and ghovol (frame drum), and are usually played in mugham segah. In the northern Caucasus the dances of the Jewish communities are the yir, lezginka and suydum tayaq. The former consists of an opening improvisation in free rhythm based on motifs from well-known songs, a short middle passage hinting at the rhythm used in the next sections, a sudden return to the improvisation of the opening, and a final section that consists of several melodies, each faster than the one preceding. Occasionally the yir is performed as a purely instrumental piece without dancing, being played on the garmoshka and ghovol. A fragment from the opening section of the yir may be used as an introduction to an autonomous dance, such as the lezginka, or a song. The lezginka, a widespread dance from the northern Caucasus, has several melodies, each named after the village of its origin. It takes the form of a theme and variations and is played mainly on the zurnov (but often now on the clarinet) accompanied by the garmoshka and govhol. The suydum-tayaq (Kumiq: 'love stick') dance for couples is, like the lezginka, a theme and variations and is characteristically in 3/4 time; it is played on the garmoshka and ghovol.

Outstanding Jewish performers were also involved in the transmission of the shashmakom tradition of Uzbekistan and Tajikistan. The old Jewish style of shashmakom was chamber-like, being performed only by the Uzbeki tanbur accompanied by the doira (large frame drum). Under Soviet influence, larger ensembles were formed consisting, in addition to the traditional instruments, of the dutar (two-string lute), chang (hammered zither related to the Persian sanṭūr), ghijak (upright spike fiddle), nāy (transverse flute) and clarinet. Among the distinguished Jewish shashmakom performers in the 20th century are Levi Bobohonov, Gabriel Mullokandov, the Talmasov brothers, Berta Davidov, Barno Izhakova and the Eliezerov family who reached Palestine in the 1930s and perpetuated their tradition there (Slobin, 1982). After the collapse of the Soviet Union, Jewish musicians from Uzbekistan and Tajikistan, who comprised a relatively large percentage of the professional performers in their original countries, resettled in Israel and the USA (especially in the New York area), where they continue to develop their art today.

Female Jewish instrumentalists in the Islamic world have chiefly been percussionists who accompanied ensembles of female singers. From the 19th century onwards, however, there is evidence of Jewish women playing other musical instruments, but always in internal gatherings. The traveller Victor Guerin witnessed in mid-19th century Rhodes Sephardi girls and women who met regularly at the fountain in the main street and knew how to play 'a guitar that resembled a Spanish mandolin and accompanied singing and dancing at celebrations' (1856). The playing of string instruments such as the 'ūd, mandolin and even the qānūn was customary among East Sephardi women in the early 20th century as part of the modernization processes affecting their communities during this period.

Examples of semi-professional female ensembles are the daqqāqāt from Iraq, a group of four or five drum players who entertained audiences at Jewish weddings and parties. Similar to them are the tañedoras in the Sephardi communities of the Ottoman Empire. Jewish women performing outside their community, however, were frowned upon. A rabbinical responsum by Rabbi Moshe Israel from the Island of Rhodes (d 1782; see Moshe yedabber, f.57*a*) recalls two Jewish merchants who witnessed a group of non-Jewish men and women leaving a social gathering playing drums and wind instruments. Among them were two Jewish women, who were singing and rejoicing along with the others. The merchants reported the incident to the Rabbi who summoned the women to a meeting at which he warned them about their inappropriate conduct. The women replied that while they did indeed attend the parties of gentiles, they did so solely in a professional capacity, not to socialize with the non-Jews but to sing for payment.

(ii) Klezmer. The Yiddish term klezmer (pl. klezmorim; from the Hebrew word for musical instruments), was first used for the professional musician in the 17th century by Jews in eastern Europe. The klezmer profession originated in the older Ashkenazi centres of central Europe, where the Jewish musician had formerly been termed leyts (pl. leytsonim, from Heb.: 'clown').

The link between the west and east European klezmer traditions seems to have been Bohemia. The characteristic four to five-piece ensemble, consisting of lead violin, contra-violin (sekund), cimbalom (cimbal), bass or cello, and occasionally a flute, seems to have spread from early 17th-century Prague both eastwards and westwards. In western Europe it was adopted by non-Jews only in the 18th century, and in parts of the east during the 19th. The clarinet was accepted as a second lead instrument by the early 19th century in Moldavia, Ukraine, Lithuania and possibly other areas. In the later 19th century an ensemble of 10–15 men, featuring brass as well as strings, appeared in the cities and towns of the Tsarist Pale of Settlement and also Bessarabia. After 1900 it was recreated in the USA.

Throughout the territories of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth (Poland, Galicia, Lithuania, Belarus', Ukraine), landowners encouraged the development of the klezmorim as a Jewish guild. During the 19th century, however, after most of these territories had come under Tsarist rule, the guild-like structure of the klezmer ensembles (kapelye, khevrisa) declined, surviving mainly in Austrian Galicia and Ottoman Moldavia. Professional klezmorim formed an occupational caste, intermarrying at times with the families of wedding jesters (badkhón or marshalik). Klezmorim spoke their own Yiddish professional jargon (labushaynski). By the beginning of the 18th century klezmer ensembles were exclusively male. Traditionally, the leader was the first violinist, who usually passed on his position to his son or son-in-law. While the first violinist was usually a full-time musician, the bandmembers often held secondary professions, often that of the barber.

In most of the northern areas, where Gypsies (Rom) were never particularly numerous, the klezmorim constituted the majority of the professional musicians. Principally located in the private towns on the large estates of the Polish nobility, there were also several urban centres of klezmer music, especially Vilna and Lemberg (Lwów, now L'viv), as well as Iaşi, the capital of Ottoman Moldavia. Depending upon their legal status, klezmorim played many genres of popular dance music for the nobility and for the urban gentile population. Non-Jewish sources between the 17th century and the 19th speak of the high regard in which the nobility held the best Jewish violinists and cimbalists. At the same time klezmorim from lower-status kapelyes worked as individual musicians at taverns and at peasant weddings.

While Jewish professional musicians (both male and female) were well-known in West Asia and North Africa, a distinctive Jewish instrumental repertory, style and system of genres is documented only in eastern Europe, with its derivatives in America and Israel. The genres and style of European klezmer music originated mainly in the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, probably before the middle of the 18th century. Most of the European repertory known today developed between 1800 and 1900. This repertory displays both Western and Near Eastern/Balkanic features, but reveals relatively little influence of purely local musics, except those of Moldavia and Wallachia. Since the 18th century at least – during the era of Greco-Ottoman rule in Moldavia (1711–1828) – klezmer music shared a deep mutual connection with both Moldavian and Greek instrumental traditions, resulting in the creation of a Jewish Moldavian repertory, generally performed by mixed ensembles of Jews, Gypsies, Romanians, Greeks and Russians.

The most common klezmer dance-genre was known variously as the freylakh, khosidl, rikudl, hopke, karahod or sher. Most of these tunes were created in a scale employing an augmented second degree ('freygish'), but a significant number used a minor scale. Some degree of harmonic accompaniment was present in even the simplest klezmer performance. The development of the chromatic klezmer tuning for the cimbal seems to have been a product of this early harmonization. Three-section tunes generally feature modulation and passing-note alterations. Syncopations and rhythmic contrasts within the sections of the freylakhs are striking.

Only a small fragment of the original klezmer repertory is extant today. The leading klezmorim based their performances on extended metrical or unmetred improvisations (gedanken and taksim), interspersed with dance-tunes for listening (skochne). Some Near-Eastern inspired pieces were performed with the Turkish violin tuning (tsvei shtrines: 'two strings'). These klezmorim created their own versions of liturgical or paraliturgical pieces (shteyger, khsos, tish-nign etc.), as well as individual compositions (zogekhts etc.). Among the prestigious composed wedding genres were the dobriden and mazltov. One of the major genres of the wedding ceremony proper was the improvised kale-bazetsn or kale-baveynen. Klezmorim performed their Jewish repertory principally at Jewish weddings, and at Holy Days such as Simḥat Torah, Ḥanukkah, Purim, sometimes Sukkot, Pesaḥ and Rosh-hodesh and at the end of the Sabbath. At weddings klezmorim also accompanied the rhymes of the wedding jester – otherwise they would not accompany any Jewish vocal music. Apart from both Jewish and gentile dance-music, the leading klezmorim utilized the wedding table (tish) of wealthier Jews, as well as certain Holy Days (such as Ḥanukkah) to perform their finest compositions and improvisations. Several ḥasidic courts, such as Liubavich and Sadegora in the 19th century, encouraged the development of klezmer music, either by employing local klezmorim, or by keeping their own kapelye.

Composer-klezmorim of the 19th century included Abraham Kholodenko of Berdichev, known as 'Pedotser' (1828–1902), Shepsl of Kobryn, Marder Ha-Godol of Vinnitsa, Khayim Fiedler of Orhei, Shmuel Weintraub of Brody and Khone Wolfstahl of Tarnopol (1853–1924). The first klezmer to achieve fame on the European concert stage was the Belarusian cimbalist Mikhl Guzikow (1806–37). In 19th-century Moldavia, such klezmorim as Itsik Tsambalgiu and Lemish of Beltsi were performers and composers of the local urban music that was also performed by Gypsies. Similar trends existed in Hungary, where Jewish musicians seem to have played exclusively non-Jewish popular pieces. The descendant of a Hungarian klezmer family, Mordekhai Rosenthal (Rózsavölgyi, Márk, 1787–1848) became one of the first composers to introduce the popular national style (verbunkos) into Western-style symphonic and chamber music; such a practice among Jewish musicians, however, seems to have been unique to Hungary.

Music notation seems to have been first accepted by ensemble leaders in the early 19th century, at least in the larger centres. While some leaders wrote down their compositions, they were never published, but handed down only to their successors in the kapelye. The majority of small-town klezmorim remained illiterate until late in the 19th century. The acceptance of Jews into Russian and Austrian conservatories in the last third of the 19th century affected both the performance style and professional opportunities of klezmorim in larger cities and towns. After World War I klezmorim were increasingly integrated into various forms of European musical life, while sometimes also maintaining a role in the communal music of the Jews. The Holocaust put a complete end to klezmer music in Poland, while the genre and profession were largely surpressed in the Soviet Union.

Documentation of klezmer music began only in the early 20th century. Between 1908 and 1911 the Columbia, Victor and Odeon labels recorded violin and cimbal duets through their studios in Lemberg (L'viv). Between 1912 and 1913 the Warsaw-based Sirena and the Kiev-based Stella companies recorded many sides by the 'Belf's Romanian Orchestra'. In this era a few sides were issued in Istanbul by the Odeon and Orfeon labels. Scientific collection of klezmer music began between 1912 and 1914 in Tsarist Ukraine and Belarus', principally by Joel Engel (1868–1927), working with S. An-Ski (1863–1920). In the 1930s they were followed by Moisey Beregovski (1892–1961) at the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences in Kiev, who amassed the single most significant collection of klezmer music. Moshe Bik's small but important collection from Orhei, Bessarabia was published in Haifa in 1964. In New York the klezmer violinist Wolf Kostakowsky published a major commercial collection of dance repertory in 1916. Between roughly 1912 and 1929 American record companies issued a large number of klezmer recordings featuring large ensembles, clarinetists or violinists. A more purely American klezmer repertory was issued in the 1940s and 1950s.

Previously unknown repertory is emerging from older Jewish musicians from the former Soviet Union. Certain ḥasidic groups in Israel and America still preserve some of their instrumental traditions; several ḥasidic vocal repertories are also closely related to klezmer music. In addition, a small independent repertory exists among Orthodox musicians in Israel. Of the numerous klezmer manuscripts that once existed, many were destroyed in the 20th century, but some may still survive in eastern Europe and Israel. During the early decades of the 20th century, several Jewish musicians, most of them students of either Rimsky-Korsakov or Liadov at the St Petersburg Conservatory, composed pieces based in part on the klezmer repertory. The major figures in this movement were Joel Engel, Joseph Achron (1886–1943), Alexander Krein (1883–1951), Mikhail Gniessin (1883–1957) and Jacob Weinberg (1879–1956). The clarinetist Simeon Bellison (1883–1953), an early associate of Engel, continued to perform this repertory with his Zimro Ensemble (1918) and, after 1920, with the New York Philharmonic.

In America, following the mass immigration from eastern Europe in 1881, much of the klezmer repertory and its distinctive performance style were lost. It was only during the 1920s that an American klezmer music began to emerge, chiefly in New York. Its most influential figures were the clarinetists Naftule Brandwein (1889–1963) and Dave Tarras (1897–1989). Tarras's music, which combined a mainly Romanian repertory with a classically-influenced clarinet tone, became the model for most American Jewish dance music during the early 1960s. By this period most of the American-born children of the klezmer families abandoned Jewish music, entering the classical or various popular fields. Only a small minority of these musicians continued to perform parts of the American klezmer dance repertory for parochial Jewish communities in New York, Philadelphia, Boston or Toronto.

The revival of klezmer music occurred in two distinct stages, the first *c*1970–85, and the second from 1985 to the present. In the early 1970s Giora Feidman, a clarinetist with the Israel Philharmonic, began to popularize American klezmer music in Europe. In the mid-1970s young musicians from non-klezmer families in New York and California (the Bay Area 'Klezmorim') began to relearn some of the klezmer repertory and style, mainly from old American recordings. In New York Zev Feldman and Andy Statman (cimbal and clarinet) were apprenticed to Dave Tarras, and their 1978 concert with him became a milestone in the revival. Statman went on to become a major voice of klezmer. The following decade witnessed a revival of both American klezmer and Yiddish theatre music, by such groups as the Klezmer Conservatory Band in Boston and Kapelye in New York. In 1985 Henry Sapoznik (founder of Kapelye) instituted the yearly 'KlezKamp' which fulfilled an important role in teaching klezmer and other Yiddish music.

In the mid-1980s a largely non-Jewish audience for both more traditional European and innovative klezmer styles emerged in the USA and Germany. This led to the formation of several influential groups and eventually to regular concert programmes and festivals in Europe and elsewhere featuring klezmer and other Yiddish music. Among the major groups formed at this time were the Chicago Klezmer Ensemble, Brave Old World and Budowitz, featuring such musicians as Kurt Bjorling, Joel Rubin, Michael Alpert, Alan Bern, Stuart Brotman and Joshua Horowitz. A somewhat younger group of musicians began to take klezmer music in new directions, with the support of a growing audience in Germany, especially after the unification of 1989. Klezmer Rock'n'Roll took its most influential shape with the Klezmatics (formed by Frank London and Alicia Svigals), while the clarinetist David Krakauer created a sophisticated klezmer jazz. Zev Feldman and the violinist Steven Greenman formed Khevrisa, performing European klezmer compositions. By the early 1990s Germany was the home to an increasing number of klezmer ensembles and performers, followed by the Netherlands and other European countries. In Israel a small group of Orthodox klezmorim, led by Musa Berlin, perform a largely American-derived, but partly local, repertory especially at religious pilgrimages.

V. Art and popular music in surrounding cultures

1. The Islamic world.

(i) To 1900. Jewish musicians performing outside their own communities are documented from as early as the Middle Ages. In general, the social contexts for such activities were the palaces of Muslim rulers and the aristocracy. Unlike musicians of other religious and ethnic denominations living under Islam, the Jews were generally not slaves. However, they were compelled to appear at the courts whenever the monarchs ordered it. This status is reflected in a Jewish folk tale found in various versions throughout the Islamic countries: a Jewish musician is ordered to play or sing in the midst of a Jewish Holy Day against his religious precepts, thus creating the dilemma of whether to remain faithful and face the consequences, or to betray his faith; in some versions of the story the Jewish musician commits suicide, in others he saves his life by intoning a song of the corresponding Jewish Holy Day.

The names of several Jewish musicians serving at the Muslim courts of Spain are recorded. For example, in the semi-mythological history of Ziryāb, the founder of the Western Arabic school, a Jewish musician, known as al-Mansūr al-Yahūdī, who was active at the court of Al-Hakīm I and 'Abd al-Rahmān II in Cordoba, is sent to Algesiras to receive the great musician coming from the Eastern Caliphate. Rabbi Eliyahu Capsali (1483–1555) from Constantinople related the story of a Jewish musician, a refugee from Spain, called Abraham who was nominated by Sultān Bāyazīd II (1481–1511) to the highest musical position in the seraglio after the monarch in disguise heard him play at the Jewish quarter (Capsali, 1976, i, 91ff). Sometimes, Jewish musicians served as the means of linking the Jewish community to the centres of political power. In Libya Jewish men gained access to the palace 'by virtue of their abilities as singers' (Goldberg, 1990, p.26).

The acquaintance of Jewish thinkers with Arabic music theory from the time of Sa'adyah Gaon (882–942) forms another point of contact with the surrounding Islamic music culture. Gaon's passage on the rhythmic cycles in his Sefer emunot ve-de'ot is apparently indebted to the works of Al-Kindī (836–901). This involvement continued in Spain. Yehuda ibn Tibbon's Arabic translation of the famous passage on singing in the Sefer ha-kuzari by Yehuda Halevy (1075–*c*1141) is indebted to the terminology of the Kitāb al-mūsīqī al-kabīr by Al-Fārābī (873–951). The source of a passage on music in the Sefer ha-mevaqqesh by Shem-Tov ben Yosef ibn Falaqera (1225–95) appears to be the 'Epistle of Music' composed by members of the Brotherhood of Purity sect (Ikhwān al-Safā; Shiloah, 1978).

(ii) 20th century. European colonialism in North Africa and the Middle East since the 19th century granted the Jews a more secure status and created for Jewish artists new opportunities in the musical life in the major cities of these areas. The development of the publishing houses, broadcasting and the recording and film industries boosted this Jewish presence. Jews were also actively involved in live musical performances in coffeehouses. Thus, while Jewish musicians and music entrepreneurs continued to be involved in the performance of the classical traditions (see §IV, 3(i) above), they also commanded the emerging secular popular music styles stemming from the recording industry and the movies, especially in North Africa. Notable among performers in the popular Algerian styles are the blind singer and 'ūd player Reinette Sultana Daud, also called Reinette l'Oranaise, Raymond Leyris from Constantine, the violinist Sylvain Ghrenassia, Edmond Atlan, and Enrico Macias, son of Sylvain, who attained a great success in France (Teboul, 1987). In Tunisia, the French- and Egyptian-influenced popular song of the city of Tunis has been composed and performed since the early 20th century mostly by Jews, such as the sisters Shamama and Leila Qfez, Raoul Journo, Habiba Mssika (d 1931), Luezia Tunsia, Simon Amiel (born in Egypt), Bishi Slama (called Khaisa) and the cantor Asher Mizraḥi, who came from Jerusalem and also recorded secular songs (Taieb, 1989). Among the performers of popular music genres in Morocco are Zohara Elfassiya, Ibrahim Suiri, Elma'alma Nejma and Sami Elmaghrebi. The latter, who was influenced by another prominent Jewish singer from Algeria, Salim Halali, also became a prominent performer for the immigrant communities of Moroccan Jews in France, Canada and Israel. In Israel the chief programmer of Moroccan popular music is Sheikh Muizo (Moshe 'Attar).

Jewish participation in the European-influenced popular urban culture of the Islamic countries from the 20th century onwards is one of the many signs of the weakening of traditional Jewish life and of the authority of the religious leadership during this period. As a means of avoiding the influence of the entertainment industry and of the coffeehouses, some rabbis allowed the composition of Hebrew sacred songs texts set to the melodies of the most popular songs of the day. An expert in this field was Rabbi David Buzaglo from Morocco.

There were cases in which the deep involvement of Jewish artists in the entertainment industry, coupled with the nationalist policies of the mass media of the Islamic countries, forced them to convert to Islam as a mean to reach the summit of success, as for example the great Egyptian Jewish singer Layla Murād. Those who refused to follow this trend sometimes had no choice but to leave their native country. Such appears to have been the case of cantor Isaac Algazi (1889–1951), an expert in the Turkish ghazal, who emigrated in the early 1930s to South America.

2. The Christian world.

(i) Introduction. The concept of 'Jewish music' was controversial in the case of Western art music compositions that acquired 'Jewish' connotations through the explicit intent of composers or through an audience's interpretation. Devoid of religious contexts, Jewish connotations were created by titles or by the Jewish origin of their composers, necessarily linked with vague musical properties. The confusion was illustrated when, in 1946, a survey held by the Palestine Broadcast Service revealed that listeners labelled Varlaam's aria from Boris Godunov as 'Jewish' (Hirshberg, 1995, p.252). The existence of Jewish music was questioned, especially in response to Wagner's 'Judentum in der Musik'. Most of the papers read at The Jewish Music Forum (founded in New York, 1939) struggled with the definition of their own titles. Faced with the challenge of his bibliography Sendrey wrote that 'every statement regarding the style . . . must be viewed . . . as a more or less arbitrary opinion' (1951, p.xxi).

Since the 1920s three models have emerged:

(1) The contextual model, which regards the inclusion of Jewish chant melodies or folk tunes as a precondition for the Jewishness of a concert composition (Werner, 1978). However, this model has been precarious from the outset; Idelsohn, for example, defined Bruch's Kol nidré as 'German' music despite the quotation of a Jewish liturgical melody (1929/R, p.466). Wolpe, however, argued that the audience's recognition of folk material within a concert piece was not a necessary condition for the identification of music as 'Jewish', and that radical transformations of the folk material should be allowed when used in art music (1946).

(2) The sociological model, which considers Jewish communal life, such as existed before World War II in eastern Europe, as a precondition for Jewish folk music (Stutschewsky, 1935) and regards Jewish art music as a development dependent on the establishment of Jewish territorial entity in Palestine (Idelsohn, 1929/R; see also Hirshberg, 1995, p.243). In 1943 Sachs convened a symposium in which he claimed that music merely of the Jews (Meyerbeer's) or for the Jews (Sulzer) was 'not Jewish music', and that national music can develop only 'within a nation on its own soil'.

(3) The genetic-psychological model, which identifies certain general musical traits as emanating from the inner Jewish soul. Nadel (1923) adopted Idelsohn's characteristics of synagogue music (recitative, melodic diatonicism, anapaestic rhythm and structural parallelism), to which he added meditative tendencies, mixed tonalities and irregular rhythmic changes – all of which also fitted polyphonic art music (see Ringer, 1990, p.194). Berl (1926) considered 'Jewishness' to be embedded in the Asiatic character of the 'autonomous melody' and vocal expression of Jewish composers, including Meyerbeer and the converted Mendelssohn. Berl considered Jewish music a fresh inspiration for the renewal of European music following the 'Romantic crisis'. His approach was adopted by Felber (1928) and Fromm (1978), and theoretically refined in Ringer's concept of 'affective inheritance' (Ringer, 1990, p.201), which was applied to Mahler, Bloch and Schoenberg as the epitomes of Jewish musical expression.

(ii) Pre-Emancipation. Evidence indicates that some Jews actively participated in the music of the surrounding Christian culture as early as the Middle Ages. Mahieu le Juif, for example, was a French trouvère poet-composer who is thought to have lived during the 13th century, and Jews are known to have been involved in performances of the Cantigas de Santa Maria at the court of Alfonso el Sabio (1252–84) in Castille. Such evidence, however, remains exceptional and Jewish art music was a relatively late development in the general history of the Western music tradition, appearing in Italy only at the end of the 16th century. The problems of explaining why Jewish art music developed so late and what motivated its formation in the first place must, therefore, be addressed.

The 'late start' may partly have resulted from rabbinical antagonism to all kinds of music that break with traditional song as practised in the synagogue. With the destruction of the Second Temple, Jews were expected to be in perpetual mourning, and hence not to display art. The rabbis condemned secular music and the use of instruments, frowning upon music as a source of entertainment (Maimonides). Synagogue chant, for prayers and the cantillation of the scriptural readings, was not considered to be 'music', but rather a melodic inflection of sacred texts; from a rabbinical standpoint it sufficed to fulfil the ritual needs of the community.

Yet there are other reasons for the late start: synagogue music itself has traditionally been monophonic and this defining characteristic limited other forms of music-making. Art music (polyphonic music in particular) was associated with Christians, and Jewish authorities hardly encouraged the imitation of 'Christian ways' (ḥukat ha-goy) in prayer services or communal activities. A further problem that had to be overcome before a tradition of art music could develop was notation. Because Hebrew is written from right to left, the Western system of notation could not ensure an adequate correlation of notes with the syllables of Hebrew texts. Except for isolated examples of Hebrew chants before the 17th century (three hymns from the 12th century, and examples of cantillation in 16th- and 17th-century humanist writings on Hebrew grammar), the earliest fully fledged notation of Hebrew polyphony was that in Salamone Rossi's sacred songs published in 1622–3.

The motivation for an art music tradition came from various quarters. First, the practice of hymn composition: hymns, or piyyuṭim, were introduced into the synagogue as early as the 5th century, only to become associated, after the 10th, with strophic metrical forms (see above, §III, 2(iv)). Three elements were crucial: the iterative structures of the verse; its quantitative or sometimes qualitative measurement; and the melodies to which the verse was performed – some drawn from secular or non-Jewish sources and often wed to the Hebrew texts as contrafacta. In this respect the piyyuṭ differed from biblical cantillation, which usually had free rhythms, prose texts and ekphonetic motivic patterns. From the very beginning 'new' melodies were often cultivated in its performance; the 13th-century Sefer ḥasidim ('Book of the Pious') orders singers of piyyuṭim to 'seek for melodies and when you pray employ a melody which will be beautiful and soft in your eyes'. By contrast, the 'melodies' of the cantillated texts were not to be tampered with, for they were thought, by legend, to have been delivered to Moses on Mount Sinai. With the gradual rise of the ḥazzan to a position of prominence in the synagogue liturgy, there was a concomitant tendency to favour the introduction of a 'new' repertory suited to displaying his increasingly professional skills.

Another element in the formation of an incipient polyphony was the meshorerim practice of the Ashkenazi rite from the 16th century (or perhaps even earlier) onwards. The ḥazzan was supported at times by two assistants, one a boy with a higher voice, the other an adult with a bass voice; they punctuated various portions of the ḥazzan's phrase, particularly its cadences, creating three-part harmony (see §III, 3(iii) above). Still other elements might have been influential: the use of music as an adjunct to joyous Holy Days (e.g. Simḥat Torah, Purim) and to private and communal festivities (banquets, weddings, circumcisions, the consecration of a synagogue, the inauguration of a Torah scroll); the efforts deployed by rabbis of a more liberal tendency, in particular Leon Modena (d 1648), to introduce part singing into the synagogue; the service of Jewish musicians in the Italian courts (Mantua, Turin), where they became acquainted with, and eventually adopted, the latest styles of Christian art music. Jewish musicians also performed in the Mantuan Jewish theatre, which, from the mid-16th century to the early 17th, provided theatrical entertainment with musical interludes for Christian audiences, especially during the Carnival season. In justifying their interest in art music, Jews often cited the example of the glorious music practised in the ancient Temple, which Salamone Rossi, among others, was thought to have revived in his own day (according to Leon Modena's preface to Rossi's Hebrew collection).

Art music by Jewish composers began in Italy, particularly Mantua, in the late 16th century, then spread to Amsterdam and southern France in the 17th and 18th centuries. Its practical remains are limited. Secular vocal music (madrigals, canzonettas etc.) is represented by collections of the Jewish composers David Sacerdote (1575), Salamone Rossi (eight books; 1600–28), Davit da Civita (1616) and Allegro Porto (three books; 1619–25), although with the exception of Rossi's the collections are all incomplete, lacking one or more voices. The only known instrumental works are the four collections by Rossi (1607–22; containing sinfonias, sonatas, gagliardas, correntes etc.). Sacred art music with Hebrew texts seems to have been introduced into the synagogue in the first decade of the 17th century, spreading from Ferrara to Mantua, Venice and other mainly northern Italian centres. Such music may have been largely improvised, for only two early Italian collections are extant: Rossi's Ha-shirim asher li-shelomo and the presumably eight-voice pieces, of which only one of the voices survives, in an anonymous manuscript (US-CIhc Birnbaum 4F 71; ?Venice), which most likely dates from the late 1620s or the 1630s. From the late 17th century to the end of the 18th, a small number of cantatas and liturgical songs was composed for use in Venice (or perhaps Modena), Casale Monferrato and Siena, in connection with celebrations of religious confraternities or the dedication of a new Torah scroll: their composers are either unknown or Christian (e.g. Carlo Grossi, 1681; Volunio Gallichi, 1786, 1796). In Amsterdam during the later 17th century, sacred music was performed in the Great Synagogue of the Portuguese Jewish community, although the earliest known sources (cantatas, choral works) date from the 18th. Of the various composers two were outstanding: Abraham Caceres (a Jew) and C.J. Lidarti (a Jesuit Christian). From southern France remains a single cantata; composed about 1680–1700 by Louis Saladin (a non-Jew) to celebrate a circumcision, it consists of preludes, dances and choruses.

The most important early Jewish composer was Salamone Rossi. In addition to his 12 secular collections he may be credited with the first polyphonic set of Hebrew sacred songs (Ha-shirim asher li-shelomo). His activity as an art music composer was paralleled by utterances of contemporary writers, among them Judah Moscato, who, in a sermon on music (printed in 1588), expanded on the symbolism of the number eight (the octave, hence perfection; Simḥat Torah, the joyous eighth day of Sukkot; the scientia divina, or eighth science that forms the culmination of the seven liberal arts); Leon Modena, who debated the legitimacy of using art music in the synagogue in a responsum published in 1605; and Abraham ben David Portaleone, who, in his voluminous treatise Shilṭei ha-gibborim ('Shields of Heroes', 1612), described the music in the ancient Temple after the example of the forms, practices and instruments of 16th- and 17th-century Italian art music.

(iii) Emancipation to World War II. The 150-year period that began with the French Revolution and culminated in World War II saw some of the most dramatic social upheavals and cultural developments in European Jewish history. Until the end of the 18th century, European Jews had generally been forced to live in ghettos or shtetls (Jewish villages) and had been severely restricted in their choice of profession. There was comparatively little interaction between Jews and their Christian neighbours, and participation in the musical arts – conducted usually under the auspices of the Church and Court – was closed to all but a few privileged Jews. However, a thorough musical education was prevented not only through the official blocking of access to institutions of higher learning, but also from within the Jewish community itself, as sacred vocal music, for prayer and praise of God, was the only musical expression fully approved of by the rabbinical authorities. Klezmer musicians had been tolerated only because the entertainments provided by this low stratum of east European Jewish society evoked a suitably lively atmosphere at weddings and other communal festivities. Therefore, talented individuals with an interest in 'serious music' had no legitimate outlet except as synagogue cantors or choristers, who taught and learnt their art according to an internal system of apprenticeship. Consequently, no framework existed for the training of composers.

In the 19th century, as the effects of the Emancipation spread throughout Europe, the physical and psychological walls of the ghetto were gradually dismantled, and Jewish integration, acculturation and assimilation became evident everywhere to a greater or lesser extent. In eastern Europe, the Jews reflected the current mood of other ethnic groups, who chose to rediscover and consolidate their respective identities. This new national awareness was expressed through haskalah (religious and philosophical enlightenment) and the absorption of environmental elements for the purpose of enriching their Yiddish and Hebrew literature. Although the consequences of political emancipation in the West were felt from the beginning, they were slow to penetrate fully the Russian 'Pale of Settlement' (a swathe of land in which Jews were permitted to live); only specially privileged Jews were allowed to inhabit the larger cities, and a numerus clausus obtained in most educational institutions. Those who wanted a musical training had to travel to the conservatories of the West. Many Orthodox cantors and choirmasters learnt the necessary skills to enable them to create an effective and sensitive synthesis of classical Western harmony within the melos of traditional synagogue chant without destroying its modal essence. In Poland Jews were able to participate more actively in the musical life of their surrounding culture: they regularly attended concerts, theatre and opera performances, established Jewish music societies, played in orchestras and sang in choirs – as both professionals and amateurs.

From the 1880s onwards, a steady stream of east European Jewish refugees fleeing from pogroms settled in the West, especially in the relatively philo-Semitic USA, where they could choose whether to maintain or relinquish their Jewishness. In western and central Europe from the early 19th century onwards there were energetic moves to dispense with national and religious barriers and to recognize the universality of the human race. Jews, now full citizens of the lands they inhabited, could be part of this new society; they could enjoy a liberal education and contribute freely to the development of science and the arts. For the first time they had access to conservatory training and opportunities to perform music with their Christian neighbours. Indeed, France was the first European country in which a Jewish composer could receive the highest national honours. Halévy, for example, became the first Jew to win the Grand Prix de Rome in 1819. Synagogue cantors in Vienna, Paris, London and elsewhere, much to the consternation of their more traditional congregations, developed a taste for opera and Lieder, and some became leading exponents of these art forms.

With the rise of capitalism and the middle classes, a wider public gained access to concerts, ballet and opera, and this in turn created a growing demand for composers and performers. Despite the hitherto almost complete gulf between the practices of traditional Jewish music and those of Western art music, Jews rapidly became active – a few achieving notable international success – as composers, conductors, performers, scholars, teachers, directors, editors, publishers, critics, impresarios, patrons and piano manufacturers. Paradoxically, this new liberty brought its own problems and complexities to the issue of Jewish identity, especially for composers (who are the principal subjects of this survey). A few resolved the matter of identity by composing primarily for the synagogue. The Reform Movement, which began in Germany in the early 19th century, enlisted the services of trained musicians – both Jews and Christians – who remodelled liturgical settings for the newly built 'Temples' (the designation used to this day for German and American Reform synagogues) in the style of contemporary classical and church composers. Admittedly, the influence of the West was pervasive: traditional modes and motifs were standardized into major and minor tonalities and harmonized accordingly.

The majority of Jews, however, especially in the French- and German-speaking countries, became anxious to be seen as full members of the nationality, culture and society in which they lived. This desire was often expressed in a self-conscious and exaggerated manner, which created tensions both within the Jewish community and between Jews and Christians. Orthodox and Traditional Jews viewed assimilated Jews as opportunists, and those who converted to Christianity as traitors. However, those who had left the Jewish fold by default or by formal conversion – either at the behest of their parents (who had them baptized) or of their own volition as adults – felt justified in expressing their alienation from Judaism as a religion, their desire for the perceived benefits of speedier emancipation or their wish to protect themselves from accusations of 'double allegiance'. In any event, hostility from outside did not disappear. No matter how earnestly Jews attempted to compose European music for European audiences, there were those who never failed to remind them of their original identity. Wagner, in at least two of his essays (Das Judenthum in der Musik of 1850, revised in 1869, and Erkenne dich selbst of 1881), attacked the rootlessness and lack of indigenous art music of the Jews, accusing even the greatest of them of mimicry, lack of depth and an inability to be truly creative. But if there were a tendency among Jewish composers to emphasize intellectuality, craft, mastery of the rules of formal design and technique, and in some cases to develop a taste for satire and irony, it may have been because they felt vulnerable and sensed the need to protect themselves by disguising or even suppressing any exposure of their inner life and deeper emotions in the interests of proclaiming their newly evolved musical identity.

Five of the greatest Jewish-born composers of the Romantic era came from culturally Jewish backgrounds and clearly identified themselves as Jews: Meyerbeer (1791–1864), Halévy (1799–1862), Mendelssohn (1809–47), Offenbach (1819–80) and Mahler (1860–1911). But were there any traits in their works that could be described as distinctly Jewish? Were there any conscious or subconscious reminiscences of traditional elements from childhood?

As a child, Meyerbeer had a private Hebrew teacher as well as a Jewish tutor for general subjects. His father, Herz Beer, was a wealthy German banker who opened a Reform Temple in his own home, for which Jakob (later Giacomo) composed a setting of the Sabbath text Uvnucho yomar for five-part mixed choir. He is on record as stating his belief that the instruments of the ancient Holy Land (harps, horns, trumpets etc.) should be used in modern Temples. Although he wrote numerous psalm settings and biblical romances, and was an active member of Reform congregations in Paris and Berlin, none of his mature stage works was based on Jewish subjects. However, he accepted an invitation to write an anthem for the Seitenstettengasse Tempel in Vienna and was only prevented from fulfilling this commission by the onset of his final illness.

Halévy's father, Elias Levy, was a cantor, teacher, Hebrew poet and scribe who compiled the first ever Hebrew–French dictionary and edited the weekly Parisian journal L'israélite français. He chanted his son's setting of Psalm cxviii at his synagogue in the Rue St. Avoye for the first time at the High Holy Day services of 1819. This work was later included in the first volume of Zemiroth Israel ('Chants of Israel'), music for the entire liturgical year by the Parisian cantor and composer Samuel Naumbourg. Halévy, an active member of the Consistoire israélite in Paris, wrote several works for the synagogue, including Hebrew settings of Psalm cxxx and of the Sabbath prayer Yigdal for cantor and three-part mixed choir. Of his 30 stage works La Juive (1835), based on Lessing's Nathan der Weise, is the most frequently performed. Others with Jewish associations include Le Juif errant (1852), Le Nabah (1853) and Les plagues de Nil (1959). Noé was completed posthumously by his son-in-law Bizet.

Mendelssohn, though a sincere and practising Lutheran, remained conscious not only of the literary and philosophical heritage of his illustrious grandfather Moses, but also of political and social issues affecting the Jews of his own day (as evidenced in copious correspondence with various members of his family). His admiration for the music of other Jewish-born musicians encompassed not only the classical compositions of Ignaz Moscheles and Ferdinand David, but also the klezmer performances of the folk musician Mikhl Gusikow, whom he described enthusiastically as a genius. Some scholars have pointed to Mendelssohn's use of a popular melody for the Sabbath Yiğdal hymn (based on the 13 articles of faith as formulated by Maimonides, 1135–1204) in one of his early String Symphonies, as well as a traditional High Holy Day chant Adonai, adonai, El raḥum in 'Behold, God the Lord passed by' towards the end of Elijah. Others have speculated that the contours of the melody presented at the beginning of the Violin Concerto show a clear affinity with motifs associated with certain Ashkenazi prayer modes. Mendelssohn wrote a German setting of Psalm c for the Reform Temple in Hamburg and planned an oratorio on the subject of Moses.

Offenbach's father, Cantor Isaac Juda Eberst, wrote about 300 songs and recitatives for the Sabbath and Festivals. At the age of 18 Offenbach composed a piano suite entitled Rebecca, as well as a collection of waltzes based on Jewish motifs.

Much has been written about the Jewishness of Mahler. Whereas this factor was an essential part of his psychological and spiritual make-up, the question of specifically Jewish elements in his music is more obscure and debatable. Some melodies do show an affinity with the east European ḥasidic style in particular, but ḥasidic music has always borrowed freely from the non-Jewish environment and Mahler also felt a close connection with Bohemian and other folk and popular styles. Although he became Catholic in 1897 in order to facilitate his appointment as conductor of the Imperial and Royal Court Opera in Vienna, he was still able in later life to recall the synagogal chants of his youth and to improvise piano accompaniments to them.

In addition to the aforementioned, a number of 19th-century Jewish composers in the European mainstream showed a passing interest in historical or religious Jewish themes: Charles-Valentin Alkan, Karl Goldmark, Ferdinand Hiller, Josef Joachim, Isaac Nathan and Anton Rubinstein to name a few. (So, also, did some Christian composers such as Beethoven, Bruch, Massenet, Musorgsky, Saint-Saëns and Schubert.) Others born Jewish, such as Dukas, Heller, Moscheles, Moszkowski and Wieniawski, found their sources of inspiration elsewhere. It seems that none of the above was motivated to express a specifically Jewish ethos through music.

The 20th century was entirely different. The seeds of a vibrant Jewish consciousness in music were sown in both eastern and western Europe at the turn of the century and began to bear fruit during its first decade. The collection of sacred and secular traditions gained new momentum with the invention of the phonograph. Composers soon realized how valuable these resources would be as a means of expressing the mood and experience of the people. The resulting acculturation and eclecticism produced a kaleidoscope of contemporary styles in which Jewish history and legend, text and symbol, modality and tone colour could be blended into the richness of the mainstream. In a short survey it is possible only to examine a small representative sample of the sudden proliferation of Jewish art music that emerged in the four decades before World War II.

In eastern Europe this musical burgeoning took the form of what might be described as a 'school' of composition, consolidated through the foundation of the St Petersburg Jewish Folk Music Society in 1908. Ever since the especially severe pogroms of the 1880s Jews had been leaving eastern Europe in large numbers, mainly for Palestine and the USA. But in spite of this mass emigration (which continued right up to the outbreak of war in 1939), Jews in Russia and Poland were growing in number and congregating in the larger cities, to the extent that they formed about 70% of the world Jewish population at this time. Deeply traditional in their upbringing, they developed a vigorous cultural life, based on the synagogue and on Yiddish lore, literature and music. Many Russian non-Jewish composers, such as Balakirev, Glazunov, Glinka, Ippolitov-Ivanov, Liadov, Musorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov and Taneyev, became aware of the distinctive qualities of Jewish liturgical and non-liturgical music.

They stimulated the interest of the general Russian public and – more particularly – of Jewish composers. Indeed it was the non-Jewish music critic Vladimir Stasov who encouraged Joel Engel (1868–1927) to research local Jewish repertories. In 1900 Engel gave his first lecture on Jewish folk music to the Imperial Ethnographic Society in St Petersburg.

Branches of the Jewish Folk Music Society sprang up in other Russian cities. Its activities may be categorized into three main phases. First came the collection and publication of thousands of Jewish folksongs, dance tunes and – to a limited extent – cantorial chant that originated in Latvia, Poland, Galicia, Belarus′, Romania and elsewhere. Simple harmonization was the main feature of the arrangements made at this stage by composers such as Achron, Gniessin, Alexander Krein, Moses Milner, Solomon Rosowsky and Saminsky (see above, §IV, 3(ii)). In the next phase, folk material was used as the basis for original compositions, usually for chamber ensemble, in the form of rhapsodies, suites and the like. The third phase saw the development of large-scale choral and orchestral works in which the individuality of the composer took precedence over traditional elements. Some composers were engaged by the Habimah Theatre Company, based in Moscow until its transfer to Tel-Aviv in the 1920s, to write works of a national Hebrew character. Despite the disapproval of the assimilated Jewish intelligentsia on the one hand and of Orthodox Jewry on the other, the Society went from strength to strength until the advent of World War I. It enjoyed a brief revival after the Russian Revolution of 1917, but foundered during the early years of the Soviet regime. During its short existence it had organized over 1000 concerts.

Whereas there was no equivalent of the Jewish Folk Music Society in western Europe, the activities of a number of prominent individuals in the West gave expression to a new Jewish art music.

The most prominent composer of Jewish origin after Gustav Mahler was Arnold Schoenberg (1874–1951). Although his purpose was not to compose 'Jewish music' per se, he was aware of the tradition that had been passed down through many generations of cantors on his mother's side. Most of the works that exhibit Jewish elements were composed after World War II, but a few, such as the oratorio Die Jakobsleiter, the drama Der biblische Weg, Credo for unaccompanied chorus, and Kol Nidre for speaker, chorus and orchestra, were all written during or after World War I. Having converted to Lutheranism in 1898, he returned to Judaism formally in 1933, partly as a gesture of solidarity with 'Jewry in distress'. He wrote numerous analytical essays and political programmes as well as personal letters to friends concerning Jewish history and heritage. Some commentators have likened his particular system of musical serialism with ancient Near Eastern processes (not least in the pre-eminence of melody over harmony) and have suggested that his preoccupation with the Jewish liturgy left its mark on works in other respects wholly unconnected with religious texts or associations. The debate continues.

The motivation that produced the self-styled 'Jewish Works' of Ernest Bloch (1880–1959) was essentially spiritual, cultural and historical rather than religious, national or political. His grandfather was a celebrated lay-cantor in the north Swiss Jewish community of Lengnau, of which he was also President; his father had at one time intended to become a rabbi. Bloch often described his vivid childhood impressions of the Passover celebration at home. Some of the traditional synagogue chants his father used to sing found their way into youthful and mature compositions alike, not in the form of arrangements but as elements integral to the melodic, harmonic, rhythmic and textural character of the music. About a quarter of his works bear Jewish titles. Most of these were written before World War II. Some contain motifs borrowed directly from biblical cantillation modes, synagogue prayer modes and fixed chants. Others, without quoting directly from traditional sources, reflect many of the typical traits of Jewish sacred music, for example, the accentuation of short motifs into extended phrases, the use of Near Eastern scales, the microtonal inflection of melody, quasi-improvisational recitatives, frequent changes of metre and tempo, irregular phrase lengths, abrupt gestures and extremes of mood and range.

To dub Bloch a 'Jewish composer' would, however, be to oversimplify his complex musical and philosophical identity. The articles and letters he wrote at different periods of his life indicate many shifts in his attitude to composition. It would be misleading to discount the enormous influences of his teachers and the great masters from the turn of the 20th century, such as Bruckner, Debussy, Mahler, Musorgsky and Richard Strauss, as well as his strong affinities with plainchant, Renaissance, Classical, neo-classical and neo-romantic styles, and Swiss, American and Chinese folk idioms.

In many ways the music of composers such as Darius Milhaud and Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco paint a similar picture. Both came from traditional backgrounds – Milhaud from one of the oldest Jewish families in the South of France, and Castelnuovo-Tedesco from old Italian Sephardi families. Both contributed a vast oeuvre to the mainstream repertory at the same time as writing a sizeable number of works with Jewish titles, utilizing directly and indirectly the traditional melodic materials of their respective locales.

Although a number of composers of Jewish descent had already settled in the USA during the 19th century, there was comparatively little Jewish art music activity there until the advent of the 20th century, when waves of refugees arrived, fleeing the pogroms in eastern Europe, and later the darkening political situation in Central and western Europe during the 1920s and 30s. Composers – many of whom were closely involved with the International Society for Contemporary Music – found the USA a land of enormous potential: the big cities were cosmopolitan, and the financial rewards were considerable. Advances in technology made recording and broadcasting ever more attractive media for the dissemination of new works and the gulf between liturgical and non-liturgical styles rapidly became narrowed as mainstream Jewish composers began to write religious works (such as 'Sacred Services') to be performed not only in the synagogue but also as concert pieces in churches and concert halls.

This was the perfect environment in which the polar Jewish values of tradition and individualism could flourish. There was room for all composers to express themselves as classically or progressively, as ethnically or internationally as they chose. This was the so-called 'new emancipation' and led to far-reaching musical developments in Jewish music after World War II.

(iv) The Holocaust. In 1933 the persecution of Jews intensified with the coming to power of National Socialism in Germany and became the norm following the Nuremberg racial laws in 1935. Along with the confiscation of Jewish businesses, assets and property, came the gradual exclusion of Jews from cultural life. Under the Nazi concept of entartete Musik ('degenerate music'), all works by Jewish composers, and works by non-Jewish composers whose style was perceived as tainted by 'non-Aryan' influences, were banned. Jewish musicians remaining in Germany were permitted to establish all-Jewish performance societies (Jüdische Kulturbunde) for exclusively Jewish audiences, but by 1939 these gradually dissolved with the mass deportations of Jews from Germany and the occupied nations to ghettos and concentration camps.

In the ghettos of Łódz, Warsaw and Kraków, and in the fashionable apartments of Vienna, Berlin and Prague, some preservation of human values through art was treasured. Of particular significance is the repertory of original songs created in the ghettos and partisan outposts of occupied Europe. Written mostly to Yiddish texts, and often employing Polish and Russian popular melodies, there were songs documenting ghetto life, satirical songs and ballads, work songs and prayer songs. They served to remind singers and their listeners of a less troubled past, encouraged the toleration of present conditions and expressed hope for freedom. In the Vilna ghetto, the poet and partisan Hirsh Glik wrote songs with heroic messages of survival of the spirit. His marching song 'Zog nit keynmol az du geyst dem letstn veg' ('Never say that you have reached the final road') became the anthem for Jewish resistance fighters and has since been adopted by some denominations for use within the Jewish High Holy Day service. An important figure in the music folklore of the Holocaust is Shmerke Kaczerginski (1908–54), a poet and political activist who in 1943 escaped the Vilna ghetto to join the Jewish underground. He wrote and collected songs both during and after the war, and his anthology Lider fun di getos un lagern ('Songs of the Ghettos and Camps', 1948) is the most comprehensive collection of Yiddish songs from the Holocaust period.

Musical activity continued in the concentration and extermination camps, initiated officially by the Nazis and clandestinely by the prisoners. The Nazis used music as an additional instrument in their machinery of destruction, to deceive, pacify, humiliate and dehumanize their victims. They formed orchestras and bands from the prisoners and forced them to play. Auschwitz, for example, boasted six orchestras and Treblinka had a rich musical life with an orchestra, conducted for a while by Artur Gold (1897–1943). Camp orchestras played cheerful tunes to 'welcome' new arrivals, to anaesthetize musically victims being marched to the 'bath house', and to help to marshal the prisoners, accompanying them as they marched to and from work. This music may have given sustenance to otherwise tortured, starved and enslaved people and perhaps brought courage and calmed their last moments, but it was also regarded by prisoners as an insult and a deception. For the Jews playing in the orchestras, however, music was a lifeline, protecting them from the immediate death sentence imposed on all Jews under Nazism. The orchestra was a relative haven, with privileges and benefits, but survival was not guaranteed and the members had to stay in favour: they were kept alive only because they could provide a service to Nazism. Another characteristic of the camps was compulsory singing. Each camp had its special anthem; ironically two Austrian Jews composed the official Buchenwald hymn, unknown to the camp administration. Prisoners were forced to stand and sing for hours in all weathers, and anti-Semitic songs were specially composed for Jews, for example, 'O Du mein Jerusalem'. In Auschwitz, Jews had no choice but to sing this song again and again during roll calls, during exercises or whenever the Nazis fancied.

Cultural activity among the prisoners was forbidden and punishable by death. However, despite the risks, prisoners strove to preserve some small part of humanity. They formed clandestine chamber groups, sang and composed songs and arranged secret concerts in prisoner barracks. The women in Ravensbrück organized a cultural life for themselves and in Dachau concerts were performed in a disused latrine. In Buchenwald the German Communist Rudi Arndt, who was the senior block inmate despite his yellow star, encouraged gifted inmates to write poems and songs and succeeded in forming a string quartet that played Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven. Martin Rosenberg (d 1942), a professional conductor before the war, organized a secret chorus of Jewish prisoners while he was imprisoned in Sachsenhausen. According to Aleksander Kulisiewicz (also a prisoner at Sachsenhausen), in 1942 Rosenberg also wrote a parody of the old Yiddish folksong 'Tsen brider' ('Ten brothers'), in which the brothers are murdered in the gas chambers (Kulisiewicz, Polskie pieśni obozowe, 1939–1945, unpublished). In Majdanek, a simple song by an unknown Polish poet became the inmates' unofficial anthem, full of yearning and with the unspoken message of freedom. Making music encouraged solidarity among the prisoners, was a means of escaping reality and, most significantly, was a form of resistance.

While musical activity – including opera, symphonic, and choral concerts – took place and in some instances flourished for a time in the larger Polish and Lithuanian ghettos (e.g. Warsaw, Łódz, Kraków, Vilna and Kovno), few original art compositions created during this period have survived. Today one can only read contemporaneous accounts of works performed in their respective ghettos by composers such as Dawid Beigelman (1887–1945) of Łódz, or Vladimir (Wolf) Durmashkin (1914–44) of Vilna. The losses to Jewish music and to Polish music brought about by the German occupation and Nazi genocidal policies are of course incalculable. Of composers, the briefest necrology might mention (in addition to Beigelman and Durmashkin): Dawid Ajzensztadt (1890–1942); Zygmunt Bia'ostocki (d 1942); Mordecai Gebirtig (1877–1942); Israel Glatstein (1894–1942); Jakub Glatstein (1895–1942); Jósef Koffler (1896–1943); Joachim Mendelson (1897–1943); Marian Neuteich (1906–43); Nochem Shternheim (1879–1942); Izrael Szajewicz (1910–41), each of whom had made their mark in the realm of classical, popular, choral, theatre, film, or folk music. Signs that these and other once prominent figures are being reclaimed by scholars and the public include the recent (1997) appearance in Polish translation of Isachar Fater's 1970 study in Yiddish, Maciej Golab's full-scale study of Koffler (Jósef Koffler, Kraków, 1995), and the thriving market for 'nostalgia music' in post-communist Poland.

The most valuable case study of music inspired, performed and composed by Jews was in Terezín (Theresienstadt). This north-west Bohemian garrison town was used as a transit camp, where Jews were sent by the thousands between 1941 and 1944 before being transported east to extermination camps. Although it was a concentration camp, the Germans allowed the Jews to administrate autonomously everything connected with life there. Terezín was unique in that its inhabitants enjoyed a freedom of cultural life denied to other Jews throughout occupied Europe. Initially, music was forbidden and remained an underground activity, but in 1942 when the Germans realized its potential propaganda value they not only sanctioned it with the establishment of 'Freizeitgestaltung' (the administration of free time activities) but also encouraged it. Terezín was presented officially to a delegation of the International Red Cross in 1944 as a paradise ghetto sheltering its inhabitants from the ravages of the war, thus camouflaging the extermination of European Jewry from world awareness. Soloists, chamber music ensembles (especially string quartets), orchestras and choruses flourished, with performances of recitals, concerts, light music, cabarets, oratorios and even operas. Two particularly ambitious undertakings by the conductor Raphael Schächter were Smetana's The Bartered Bride and Verdi's Requiem, demonstrating the determination of the human spirit to triumph over adversity. Although not everyone was psychologically or physically in a position to care about these activities, the performances were still popular and programmes were often repeated up to a dozen times.

Among the composers who spent time in Terezín, five significantly active ones were Viktor Ullmann, Pavel Haas, Hans Krása, Karel Ancerl and Gideon Klein. Ullmann in particular produced a rich collection of works; with administrative permission, he was able to devote himself entirely to music, organizing concerts, writing reviews and articles, lecturing and composing. Especially noteworthy works composed in Terezín were Ullmann's last three piano sonatas, his third quartet and the opera allegory of the Third Reich Der Kaiser von Atlantis; Haas's Study for strings and Four Songs on Texts of Chinese Poetry; Krása's several pieces for string trio and the Terezín version of his children's opera Brundibar, performed more than 50 times and one of the most popular works in the ghetto; and Klein's piano sonata and string trio. These men also wrote original and/or arrangements of folksongs in Hebrew, Yiddish, Czech, Slovak and other languages for the many amateur choirs. Cabarets in Czech by Karel Švenk and in German by Martin Roman were appreciated and light music was performed in various venues, among them the ghetto coffeehouse, including quartet pieces by Egon Ledeč and František Domažlický and a Serenade by Robert Dauber for violin and piano. A number of specifically Jewish works were written, including settings of liturgical Hebrew texts, especially by Zikmund Schul (1916–44). Terezín was also teeming with professional musicians, many of whom survived to resume active careers, including the bass Karel Berman and the pianist Edith Kraus.

The rich and abundant musical life in Terezín, together with the other arts, maintained a level of spirituality, culture and human value in the ghetto, despite rampant disease, hunger, death and social tensions. The quality of the music composed in Terezín has often been questioned and, while it cannot be said that there was a 'Terezín style', certain elements clearly indicate the abnormal environment in which this music was created. There are musical quotations with clearly symbolic significance for listeners familiar with their original contexts, and vocal texts from both general literature and ghetto poets full of meanings relating to the realities of ghetto life. The music and musical life at Terezín for all its physical and informational isolation during its four years of existence, cannot wholly be viewed as separate from the previous worlds in which its prisoners lived. Whether considering the Schoenbergian-Stravinskian-Janáčekian compositional influences of its composers, the diversified tastes of its audiences and the often highly developed accomplishments of many of its artists, Terezín was an incredibly horrible, often intriguing and always intense experience, painful in the extreme and yet, for some, enriching and memorable. Ullmann summed it up, both practically and philosophically when he proclaimed 'it must be emphasized that Theresienstadt has served to enhance, not to impede, my musical activities, that by no means did we sit weeping on the banks of the waters of Babylon, and that our endeavour with respect to Arts was commensurate with our will to live'. In the 1980s and 90s, the music of Terezín, along with pre-war compositions by Ullmann, Haas, Krása and Klein and works by other composers, not in the ghetto but equally ostracized by National Socialist policies (including Erwin Schulhoff), has not only become well-known from scholarly research and publications of the music, but has also been justly reintegrated into international concert repertory. Without this activity, an important part of 20th-century music (especially Czech music), whose authors were brutally eradicated, might have been lost altogether.

(v) After World War II. In 1945 the world Jewish population stood at about two-thirds its pre-war total. At the time, North America became home to the largest number of Jews, and composers tried to come to terms with the trauma of the Holocaust in various ways.

Among these perhaps the most celebrated was Arnold Schoenberg, who wrote his own libretto for A Survivor from Warsaw (1947), a dramatic cantata describing the final battle of the ghetto and culminating in a proclamation of the shema' (the Jewish 'Credo'). Among other Jewish works from this period were his Hebrew setting of Psalm cxxx Mima'amakim ('Out of the depths', 1950) for six-part unaccompanied mixed choir based on a traditional ḥasidic chant, and ten psalm settings published posthumously. Unlike Bloch, Schoenberg became involved in the Zionist movement and expressed his political views vigorously in published pamphlets as well as in private correspondence.

Whereas Schoenberg submitted traditional Jewish melos to his evolving principles of serialism, Leonard Bernstein chose to develop a more tonally based American Jewish symbiosis. Prime examples of this approach are to be found in his symphonies entitled Jeremiah, The Age of Anxiety and Kaddish (all of which contain elements of biblical cantillation and synagogal prayer chant), the Chichester Psalms (in Hebrew), the ballet The Dybbuk (including references to kabbalistic numerology), Ḥalil for flute and orchestra, and the prayer Hashkivenu for cantor, mixed choir and organ. There are representations of the traditional blasts of the shofar in his operetta Candide, and his Mass – a theatre piece for singers, players and dancers – combines Jewish and East Asian thought with Catholic ritual. He and 29 others composers – including Milhaud, Weill, Castelnuovo-Tedesco and the non-Jewish Roy Harris – participated in a project entitled 'Synagogue Music by Contemporary Composers' in which 38 works for the Sabbath Eve Service were commissioned by Cantor David Putterman of New York's Park Avenue Synagogue.

Many composers working in the field of synagogue music, particularly within the Reform and Conservative denominations, have written complete Sabbath and Festival services, for ritual purposes as well as for the concert hall, inspired by the early pioneering Sacred Services of Bloch and Milhaud. Traditional Jewish modality has been adapted to the melodic, harmonic, rhythmic and textural conventions of the 20th and early 21st centuries. In addition, there has been an ever-increasing proliferation of biblical cantatas, oratorios, psalm settings, concert arias, folksong arrangements, operas, stage works, ballets, symphonies, concertos, suites, overtures, tone poems and rhapsodies that directly or indirectly reflect Jewish life and society, history and dispersal, religion and philosophy.

The list of American Jewish composers who have attained international recognition since the second part of the 20th century is formidable. Among the many prominent individuals who forged new paths were Hugo Weisgall, one of the USA's most successful opera composers, who also wrote for the synagogue (Evening Liturgies, 1986–96), as did Miriam Gideon, the doyenne of American Jewish women composers. Lazar Weiner pioneered the Yiddish art song. Herman Berlinski is at the forefront of Jewish organ music, both as composer and performer. Steven Reich, who with Philip Glass placed minimalism firmly on the agenda of the late 20th century, acknowledges his Jewish heritage in Tehillim ('Psalms'). The jazz idiom is integral to liturgical settings by Kurt Weill (Kiddush) and Charles Davidson (And David Danced before the Lord). Avant-garde techniques, including electro-acoustic music, have been developed by composers such as Yehudi Wyner in their settings of ancient texts.

Numerous musicians of Jewish birth in the United Kingdom have felt moved, to a greater or lesser extent, to express their cultural or religious heritage in their works: George Benjamin, Brian Elias, Erika Fox, Alexander Goehr, Kyla Grunebaum, Joseph Horovitz, Wilfred Josephs, Malcolm Lipkin, Robert Saxton, Ronald Senator, Malcolm Singer, are among the vanguard of the modern generation. Significant repertories of new Jewish music are being produced in the large diaspora centres of South America, Australia and South Africa, as well as the newly revived communities on the western European continent.

In the 19th century, the most important synagogue composers paid homage to the great exponents of mainstream culture. The musical idiom of Louis Lewandowski of Berlin, for example, could be described as Mendelssohnian, and that of Salomon Sulzer of Vienna as Schubertian. Since the early 20th century, however, Jewish composers in many countries have explored the interface between tradition and innovation, and have been establishing themselves as mainstream composers in their own right. They attend conferences at universities, conservatories and seminaries around the world at which issues such as the notion of 'universality' vis-à-vis the role of 'ethnicity' in the life and work of the creative artist are energetically explored.

In conclusion, it may be premature to discern a consistent pattern in the music of Jewish composers, who have participated continuously and consistently only for the last 200 years in a musical tradition that has existed in the West for a millennium. Indeed, it may be more appropriate not to seek uniformity, but rather the opposite. Such composers have already shown themselves to be flexible enough to absorb serialism and electro-acoustic techniques, Near Eastern traditions, and the shofar as a melody instrument. Given the blossoming of confidence in its cultural identity that has largely superseded the desolation of the mid-20th century, why should Jewish art music not further celebrate its vitality in an ever-expanding multiplicity of intercultural idioms?

(vi) Popular music: Tin Pan Alley and Broadway. Life in Russia was harsh for Jews in the latter half of the 19th century. From 1869 onwards they were emigrating at the rate of about 4000 every year. Following the assassination of the relatively liberal Tsar Aleksandr II and the accession of the less benevolent Aleksandr III, pogroms and draconian new legislation became for many the last straw. The provision of cheap transport to the USA, the prospect of freedom and the 'promise' of a good income in the goldene medine (Yiddish: 'golden land') were irresistible to poor and frightened Jews. The fact that many had to suffer the pain of separation from their families in the 'old country', and were forced to function as little more than slave labourers in the sweatshops of New York's Lower East Side, did not inhibit endless waves of desperate emigrants from seeking a new life.

By 1900, about half a million east European Jewish refugees had arrived in North America, and of the one and a quarter million who reached the USA between 1900 and 1924, the vast majority remained in New York, their port of entry. The culture shock was overwhelming for these mainly Orthodox Jews coming into daily contact with the vast and varied minority groups that comprised the city's population, then as today.

Gradually, however, they and their children began to take an active part in the cultural life of the metropolis. Many, having been cantors or traditional folksingers, gravitated towards the Yiddish theatres on the Lower East Side for their entertainment. Two of the most famous songs of the inter-war period were Jack Yellen's 'A yiddishe mame' (1925) – as immortalized by Sophie Tucker – and Sholom Secunda's 'Bay mir bistu sheyn' (1933) – made famous by the Barry Sisters. These and many others like them had a deep impact upon American popular taste at large. But gradually the fascination that some Jews felt for the unfamiliar cultures on their doorstep led them to investigate different ethnic, social and religious themes. The most clearly identifiable pre-existing musical traditions were those of the English settlers from the 17th century, the Irish from the 18th, the black Americans from the 18th and 19th, and the Italians from the 19th. The two main creative outlets for assimilated Jewish composers were Tin Pan Alley and the Broadway musical.

Since about 1885, New York had been the focal point for the popular music industry. A new generation of ambitious publishers made energetic use of the latest techniques in market research to select the most commercially viable music and to bring it to the attention of an enthusiastic public. 'Tin Pan Alley' was situated on West 28th Street between Fifth Avenue and Broadway. Crowded buildings housed hundreds of offices, each with its own ill-tuned piano. The owner of a particularly well-known emporium favoured the sound of piano strings wound in silver paper – hence the name of the district. In the heyday of printed sheet music, thousands of songs were produced in a steady stream; and by 1900 about 100 composers could boast sales of a million copies each.

Before 1910 the Tin Pan Alley idiom was prevalent, but thereafter a small number of talented composers dominated the scene with long series of songs in individual and immediately recognizable styles. Although a few of Irving Berlin's earliest songs (*c*1909–12) contain Jewish references, some of his best-known pieces show the influence of the wider world (White Christmas and Easter Parade). This may be seen as a metaphor for the general ethos adopted by most Tin Pan Alley composers, who wanted to be identified as American rather then Jewish. Many both espoused and rejected the heritage of their birth, on the one hand following the Jewish observance of important life-cycle events, and on the other marrying a non-Jewish spouse. Very few of their songs expressed a Jewish content, whereas many reflected a Jewish context: the home, the family and emigration from the native homeland.

The composers who became successful on Tin Pan Alley also wrote musicals for Broadway. Similarities in family background and experience allowed for many creative partnerships: composers worked closely with lyricists, librettists, directors, orchestrators, choreographers, set designers, stage technicians, actors and musicians. Although Harold Arlen, Irving Berlin and Kurt Weill were the sons of cantors, they and many other such as Leonard Bernstein, Oscar Hammerstein, Jerome Kern, Richard Rodgers and Sigmund Romberg, preferred black American, Puerto Rican, Mid-West, Scottish, French, Siamese, Chinese, Malaysian and Polynesian scenarios and musical material – in thoroughly westernized guises – as vehicles for their exploration of issues such as urban violence, class struggle and the American Dream. However, research into George Gershwin's Porgy and Bess has revealed the presence in 'It ain't necessarily so' of certain Ashkenazi prayer motifs used during the traditional barekhu blessing before and after the chanting of the Bible. And phrases resembling those of the synagogal adonai malakh mode may be detected, for example, in 'Porgy, I's your woman now'. Since Gershwin served his apprenticeship with the important Yiddish theatre composers Abraham Goldfaden and Joseph Rumshinsky at the National Theater on Second Avenue (see §IV, 2(iii)(b) above), it is hardly surprising that youthful impressions and influences should have found their way into several of his mature works. However, a projected operetta for the Yiddish theatre in collaboration with Sholom Secunda, and a proposed opera on the subject of The Dybbuk for the New York Metropolitan Opera, never reached fruition.

Traditional Jewish modal structures and linguistic forms are also to be found throughout Jerry Bock's Fiddler on the Roof (1964), one of the few Broadway musicals to confront specifically Jewish issues. This work is based on a set of short stories by the celebrated Yiddish author Sholom Aleichem. The Mixolydian flavour of the opening theme of 'If I were a rich man' and the ambiguity between major and minor 3rds throughout the song recall the salient characteristics of the adonai malakh mode, and the use of certain repeated syllables reflects a practice typical of the ḥasidic Jews.

The close relationships between the improvisational elements in jazz and in the cantorial recitative, between the syncopated rhythms of jazz and klezmer music, and between the ethos of subjugation to be found in black American and Jewish lyrics alike, all point to an immediate affinity linking the traditions that the east European immigrants brought with them and those they found on arrival.

In the 1920s Tin Pan Alley expanded in two directions: in its original form, to 42nd and 50th Streets in New York; and, with the development of the film industry, to Hollywood. The first film to be produced with a continuous soundtrack was The Jazz Singer (1927). It featured Al Jolson, the son of an immigrant Lithuanian rabbi and cantor, and the music included many traditional Jewish cantorial recitatives. The Jewish presence in the music of the film studio has been preserved by numerous composers, notably, Erich Walter Korngold in the early part of the 20th century and Maurice Jarre in more recent times.

From simple beginnings the structure, melody and harmony of Tin Pan Alley songs became more and more complex: superimposed upon triads were 7ths and 9ths, added 2nd and 6ths, augmented and diminished chords, remote modulations and elements drawn from the classical and jazz composers of the time. The genre possessed a resilience that enabled it to survive the Wall Street Crash and two World Wars. Contemporary artists such as Bob Dylan, and Simon and Garfunkel are among the many direct heirs of the Jewish popular music tradition.

Jew's [jaw's] harp [gewgaw, guimbard, jew's trump, trump] (Lat. crembalum; Fr. guimbarde, trompe de Béarn; Ger. Brummeisen, Maultrommel; It. ribeba, scaccia pensieri; Sp. trompa). A generic term for a type of mouth-resonated instrument consisting of a flexible tongue, or lamella, fixed at one end to a surrounding frame. Its many vernacular names include variants of 'trump' and 'trompa'. The association with Jews remains obscure. Buckley (1986) gives as the earliest reference an English customs register of 1545: 'Iues trounks the grose, 3s. 3d.' and in Hakluyt's Voyages, mention is made of 'Jewes harps' used as currency during voyages made in 1595. During a witch trial in 1591, 'Geilles Duncan led a reill or short daunce upon a small trump, called a Jewes Trump'. Although there is no evidence to suggest that the instrument was particularly associated with Jewish people, the attempt to explain away the problem with the term 'jaw's harp' seems unfounded. In Northumberland the name 'gewgaw' (the local pronunciation of which is not so far removed phonetically from 'jew's harp') is still current; this could be related to the Swedish munngiga, the German (Saar region) Maulgeig or the Walloon French gawe. 'Gewgaw' also means 'a cheap bauble', the Norwegian equivalent of this being jugil.

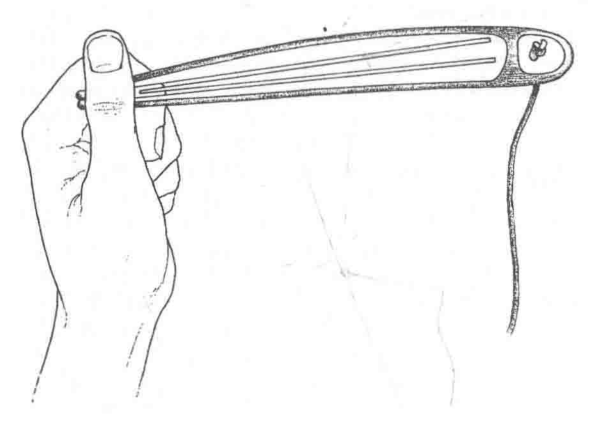
The free end of the lamella is placed in front of the player's mouth cavity and set in vibration manually; this produces a sound of fixed pitch, rich in overtones which correspond closely to a harmonic series. By various movements of the tongue and the larynx the player is able to modulate the natural frequency of the air contained in the mouth cavity which acts as resonator of infinitely variable volume and amplifies selected overtones, thus producing a wide variety of sonorous and musical effects. The complexity of the working principle of the jew's harp probably explains why, although geographical distribution is wide, it is by no means universal. The jew's harp can be said to be indigenous to most of the Eurasian land mass, where outward-pointing instruments predominate, as well as South and South-East Asia, Indonesia, Papua and Melanesia – the realm of the inward-pointing type.



The instrument is grasped by the player in two basic ways: with the lamella pointing inwards towards the palm or outwards away from it (see figs.1 and 2). Two radically different approaches to jew's harp making and playing derive from this. The frame of an outward-pointing instrument is pressed against the teeth and is actuated by directly plucking the tip of the lamella, which is usually turned up at an angle. All known outward-pointing instruments are heteroglottic (the lamella and the frame are made from separate pieces) and are normally of metal, although wood-framed specimens are known (Sedang, Central Vietnam). The frame of the inward-pointing type extends beyond the tip of the lamella, which is the part the player grasps, placing the instrument before the lips without touching the teeth. These jew's harps are normally idioglottic (lamella and frame cut from a single piece), but specimens from the Bunun of Taiwan and others are heteroglottic with one to five brass lamellae mounted in cane frames. The lamella of this type is always in one plane only, and a number of systems exist to actuate the instrument; these entail tapping the lamella near its root against the upraised wrist (Tifalmin, Papua), tapping the lamella against the thumb assisted by a string (all of Papua, Melanesia), pulling on a string attached to the end of the frame (parts of South-East and East Asia, of Indonesia, of Papua; see fig.3 and see MONGOL MUSIC fig.5) or near the middle of the lamella (Hokkaido, Eastern Siberia), plucking the end of the frame (Sino-Tibetan hill people, parts of Indonesia) or tapping an excrescence beyond the root of the lamella (Java, Sumatra). In the last two cases, the frame-end oscillates in the opposite phase to that of the lamella (compound oscillation); careful balancing of the two masses increases the duration of the note without lowering its pitch. All of these systems combined with the different materials from which the instruments may be made (bamboo, palmwood, ivory, bone, brass, etc.) plus the influence of local aesthetic tastes, bring about a very rich variety of forms for this type.

2. Bamboo jew's harp (string activated) from New Guinea: (a) playing position; (b) holding position, with lamella pointing towards the palm of the hand

The feature which must be present for an instrument to qualify as a jew's harp, and which distinguishes its working principle from that of other known mouth-resonated instruments, is the arrangement at the free end of the lamella, i.e. the part of the instrument placed before the mouth cavity (here called the embouchure). Here the gap between the lamella and the adjacent part of the frame must be kept very tight otherwise the instrument will not sound. The beats of the lamella through this restricted air-space generate a sound spectrum rich in harmonic overtones, and amplify in great detail the reactions of the resonating mouth cavity. This is what enables the player to reinforce at will single overtones or to combine several by such means as varying breath velocity or forming with the tongue one or more resonator cavities. Cutting off the air flow with the velum turns the mouth into a closed vessel with the effect of masking even-numbered harmonics, leaving only the odd-numbered ones audible. Apart from hand attacks on the lamella, rhythmic effects may be enhanced by the timing of modifications to the mouth cavity.

The jew's harp's apparent simplicity thus dissimulates a complex sound-producing system and it is surprising that, judging by its wide geographical distribution, it has been in existence for such a long time. Given that its working principles would be hard to come by, it should not be regarded as 'mankind's first instrument'. Within the Sachs-Hornbostel system, it is classified as a plucked idiophone (for details of classification see IDIOPHONE); however, its similarities with the FREE REED are obvious (certainly far more than with other lamellaphones such as the sanza) which is why many scholars in the wake of Frederick Crane (1968; see also Ledang, 1972) now classify the jew's harp as an aerophone. Clearer definition of the generic terms we use for instruments in general is perhaps the surest way forward.

The melodic possibilities of any jew's harp depend upon the fundamental pitch of the lamella's vibrating frequency. Instruments are most commonly found tuned to pitches ranging from around C = 66·4Hz up to about d = 147Hz; conversely the mouth cavity forms a resonator of fixed ambitus. A melodic player must therefore choose the pitch of the instrument according to the musical scale covered by the piece to be performed. As lower-pitched instruments have a less brilliant sound, one way of obtaining a fuller scale (and more conventional intervals) using higher instruments is to alternate, during the same piece, two or more jew's harps tuned to complementary pitches. The changes of fundamentals will moreover give a bass line and make modulation possible. The Bavarian Mayr brothers, who normally use four instruments each, first brought this technique to the attention of the wider world; other noted present-day exponents of this technique include Max Engel and Manfred Russmann. The great virtuosos of the 18th and 19th centuries were also multiple jew's harp players; Scheibler's AURA of 1816 consisted of three and five instruments, each group mounted radially on an axis. The last and most celebrated virtuoso was Eulenstein, active in the middle of the 19th century, who normally used 16 jew's harps laid out on a table before him. Orchestral compositions for jew's harp have survived, notably four instrumentally demanding ones written from 1769 to 1771 for crembalum and mandora or small ensemble by Albrechtsberger. The brummeisen also figures prominently in the Parthia ab VIII instrumentis by Johann Friedrich Hörmann (1684–1773). In the Sakha republic, numerous orchestral compositions are now being written for the khomus.

Melodic playing with a single instrument predominates in many Eurasian traditions including Western Europe, and the instrument is frequently used to provide dance music. A notable Scottish exponent was Angus Lawrie of Oban (d 1973) who played Highland bagpipe tunes with full gracing. He clearly defined each note by accentuating the contrasting tone-colours derived from varying the resonance cavities, alternately lowering and raising the velum according to whether he was playing an odd or even harmonic. Perhaps nowhere is this aspect more fully exploited than in Norway where there are many fine munnharp players, notably Eric Røine, Svein Westad and Ånon Egeland. In Kyrghyzstan there are some thrilling players of both the wooden string operated jygaç ooz komuz and the small outward-pointing temir ooz komuz when playing the latter type, the player presses the very tips of the frame on the teeth at an angle, tightly pursing the lips, giving soft, fluid sounds, occasionally enriched by a whistled note produced at the back of the mouth. In many parts of Asia and Indonesia the almost exclusive use of odd-number harmonics is much in evidence. This mode gives an unusual musical scale 'offset' from the drone since the octaves of the fundamental cannot sound; the technique also clearly brings out the formants of vowels giving a polyphonic 'gong' effect. This, interspersed with a loud trumpeting effect obtained by intermittent hard blowing through the embouchure is especially common in Indonesia – indeed, the karinding rakit played in West Java includes a bamboo tube to amplify this effect. In Bali, the gamelan genggong consists of about 15 boys playing string-operated instruments accompanied by a gong, a suling (flute) and a kendang (drum). Predominantly rhythmic use occurs in many parts of India; here the generally high-pitched and loud outward-pointing morchang or morsing plays classical tāla along with tablā or mridigam drums.

The jew's harp often occurs in more or less ritual contexts. Among the Buang of Papua, the begnakr appears, along with spinning tops, only during the yam growing season. In many parts of Siberia and Mongolia it is connected with shamanism, serving among other things to trigger off a dissociated state. Among the hill people of South-East Asia in particular, there are traditions of using the jew's harp as an artificial voice for spoken communication between courting couples.

Outward-pointing instruments are most often made by blacksmiths – a neat piece of virtuoso forging. There are many tricks of the trade essential for achieving a good instrument. In the mid-20th century it seemed that this knowledge was fast disappearing, but since the early 1990s there has been something of a revival in both jew's harp making and playing. Leaders in this movement are the Sakha (inspired over many years by the research of Ivan Alekseyev and Spiridon Shishigin) and the Norwegians, especially in the Setesdal area. Historically, commercially manufactured European instruments, emanating from centres such as Mölln in Austria and the Birmingham area of Britain (more than 20 firms at the turn of the 20th century) were widely exported from the 17th century onwards as barter goods, being enthusiastically adopted by many cultures to whom the principle was formerly unknown. Although these cultures have often produced some fine players, cases are rare in which local blacksmiths have been inspired to make their own versions. The very distinctive shapes of the bamboro by West African Songhai, Hausa and Fulani blacksmiths suggest that they have been making them for some considerable time. One finely-wrought specimen in the Musée de l'Homme, Paris, appears to have been based on a 17th-century French model; this also applies to some Madagascan lokanga vava in the same collection.

Archeological remains of the outward-pointing type are now quite abundant, many of them dating from medieval times onwards. Most are of forged iron specimens, but cast bronze frames are also common. The oldest known specimens are several cast bronze frames, some still bearing traces of an iron lamella, conserved in the Musée des Antiquités, Rouen. They were excavated in 1860s from two separate Gallo-Roman villas. Occurrence of identical frames in much later and diverse medieval sites may suggest that these cast instruments were already the products of an industry and peddled for centuries all over Europe. In Japan, iron instruments of the Heian period (9th–10th century) from the Hikawa shrine have recently been unearthed. These are nearly identical to a modern Nivkh (Giliak) specimen from the Sakhalin Peninsula, in the Musée de l'Homme. Similar smaller modern instruments from Karelia are conserved in the Finnish National Collection, along with other instruments with Indian characteristics. All this would suggest that the circulation of jew's harps as trade goods goes back much further than the European colonial era.

JOHN WRIGHT

Jewson, Frederick Bowen (b Edinburgh, 26 July 1823; d London, 28 May 1891). Scottish pianist and composer. He had his first lessons from his father, Samuel, and made his first concert appearance in the Edinburgh Assembly Rooms at the age of six. In 1834 he entered the RAM in London to study the piano under Cipriani Potter, and harmony and composition under John Goss; he became King's Scholar in 1837. In 1838 he played at the RAM a piano concerto of his own. He was soon appointed teacher of piano in the RAM, and later a director. During the 1850s he was also professor of music at St Mary's Hall, Brighton. In his earlier life Jewson was considered one of London's finest pianists, and was famous as a teacher (Mackenzie was one of his pupils). Although his compositions are little heard today, they are of fine calibre and craftmanship; the Etudes de concert (opp.16 and 23), for example, are comparable to those of his friend Moscheles. Most of his works, which included six overtures, two piano concertos, a Grand Sonata in E for piano, smaller piano pieces and some songs, were performed during his lifetime, and some piano music and songs were published in London. His sons, Frederick, an organist, and William, a violinist, successfully carried on the family tradition in London.

JEAN MARY ALLAN/ROSEMARY WILLIAMSON

Jew's trump. See JEW'S HARP.

Jež, Jakob (b Boštanj, 23 Nov 1928). Slovenian composer. He studied musicology at the Ljubljana Academy with Lipovšek and composition privately with Karol Pahor, later becoming a professor in Ljubljana. In his early music he concentrated on miniatures, either short piano pieces or solo songs with piano, in which impeccable craftsmanship is combined with an unassuming traditional idiom. From about 1960 he started writing chamber music and songs with varied instrumental accompaniments. The straightforward Pastirski spevi ('Pastoral Songs') show a typically excellent contrapuntal chamber music sense. Jež abandoned tonality in Strofe and Asonance, while retaining his subtle touch for instrumental colour. His longer works show freely coordinated linear elements of serial writing and the gradual assimilation of new instrumental techniques, as, for example, in the free expressionistic Odsevih hajamovih stihov ('Reflections on Poetry of Omar Khayyam') and in his masterpiece Do fraig amors (1968). This brilliantly combines the old and the new with the juxtaposition of modal and serial passages and uses both novel and conventional vocal and instrumental techniques in the setting of the multi-lingual text. The other two large choral works, Brižinski spomeniki and Pogled zvezd, and the musical allegory Musica noster amor, stand with Do fraig amors as his major works.

From 1974 Jež has continued the excellent series of instrumental works, Nomos, using his free linear technique; he has also composed a large number of choruses of modest dimensions and great sensitivity. Many of his works have been recorded and performed abroad. As a writer Jež has produced many articles on the music of his fellow countrymen, as well as on other contemporary composers and musical topics. He has edited works by the Slovenian composer Marij Kogoj and has been chief editor of the Slovene publishers Grlica (1967–88), Skladatelj (1980–82) and, from 1991, Naši zbori.

NIALL O'LOUGHLIN

Ježek, Jaroslav (b Prague, 25 Sept 1906; d New York, 1 Jan 1942). Czech composer and conductor. He studied composition with Jirák at the Prague Conservatory (1924–7) and in Suk's masterclasses there (1927–9), also taking piano lessons from Albín Šíma (1925–30). His personal and artistic fate was closely linked with the Prague Free Theatre (1928–39), where he worked as a composer and conductor with the renowned actor-dramatists Jiří Voskovec and Jan Werich. He was also a member of the MÁNES MUSIC GROUP. When, after the Munich agreement, the Free Theatre was disbanded, Ježek emigrated with Voskovec and Werich to the USA (1939). He was founder-conductor of the Czechoslovak Choral Group (first concert 6 June 1941) in New York, where he remained until his death. The Czech colony in New York formed the Jaroslav Ježek Foundation in his honour, the Czech Academy of Science and Art made him a member posthumously in 1946, and in 1947 his ashes were returned to Prague.

By artistic and philosophical conviction Ježek belonged to the Czech inter-war avant garde. His musical satires at the Free Theatre expressed the strong opposition to the petty bourgeoisie, to fascism and to Nazism typical of left-wing intellectuals, who in the 1930s began to identify themselves actively with the workers. The music Ježek wrote for Voskovec's and Werich's plays, in which he developed his flair for melodic invention, grew out of the jazz and dance music of the 1920s, and created a genre that aspired towards serious music; it has continued to command interest (on the radio, on disc and as a source of themes for jazz improvisation). Ježek also wrote concert works, chiefly vocal, piano and chamber pieces. In these, too, he used elements of jazz, stylized in the manner of Gershwin, Burian or Schulhoff. Furthermore, he employed various experimental devices, such as black key/white key polytonality on the piano, the alternation of odd and even metres, motoric rhythms, Hába-type quarter-tones and so on. His chamber music, however, accentuates more neo-classical tendencies, and his songs draw their inspiration from French poetry or from the 'poetist' movement in Czech verse.

Jiang Kui [Xiaozhang; style Baishi daoren, 'White Stone Daoist'] (b 1155; d Hangzhou, 1221). Chinese composer and theorist. A native of Jiangxi province, Jiang Kui occupies a unique position in Chinese musical history. In addition to being a scholar, a calligrapher and an art critic, he was also a poet, a composer and a performer of the xiao end-blown flute. His ci poems, many of which were canonized as masterpieces, promoted a new literary style and aesthetics in the Southern Song dynasty (1127–1279). His treatise on calligraphy is now a standard reference. His notated music, which is among the earliest preserved and authenticated music by a Chinese musician, includes the tunes of 17 ci songs, 14 of which are his own musical compositions, the tune of a ci song with qin (seven-string zither) accompaniment, and ten tunes of a set of ritual and didactic songs.

His theoretical treatises on music and instruments, the Dayueyi (Discussion on proper music) and the Qinse kaogutu (Illustrated investigation on the qin and se zithers), are now lost, but brief summaries of both documents are preserved in the Songshi, the standard history of the Song dynasties. As a theoretician he appears to have been orthodox, but the structure of his musical compositions and the lyricism of their sung texts, which have been comprehensively analysed and discussed by many scholars, show Jiang as an expressive and creative composer.

Jiang Wenye [Chiang Wen-yeh, Bunya Koh] (b Taibei, Taiwan, 11 June 1910; d Beijing, 24 Oct 1983). Chinese composer. Originally named Jiang Wenbin, he moved to Japan in 1923 to pursue his studies of music. Particularly influential was the composer Kōsaku Yamada with whom he studied from 1932 after completing an electrical engineering degree. Some early works were published in Japan under the Japanese pronunciation of his name, Bunya Koh. In 1938 Jiang moved to Japanese-occupied Beijing (then Beiping), where he took a post at the Beiping Normal University. He continued composing works in a wide variety of Western genres, and also provided music for Japanese propaganda films, which led to a ten-month prison sentence at the end of World War II. In 1947 Jiang joined the teaching staff of the National Arts Specialist School, and in 1950 he became a member of the composition department of the newly formed Central Conservatory of Music (founded in Tianjin but soon relocated to Beijing). Classified as a rightist in the political campaigns of 1957, his work as a teacher and composer was severely restricted, and broadcasts and performances of his music were prohibited. During the Cultural Revolution (1966–76) he was again a target, spending much time under arrest or labouring on farms, and although he was cleared in 1978, his health was ruined and he produced little before his death in 1983. Despite recent research, many of his works are lost or incomplete owing to their destruction or confiscation in 1957 and 1966. Typically, Jiang wrote in a Romantic and nationalist idiom, blending Chinese pentatonicisms with Debussian chord streams, classical Western structures such as sarabande, rondo and ternary forms, and polyrhythmic effects.

Jiang Yuequan (b Shanghai, 4 Nov 1917). Chinese Suzhou tanci ballad singer. Jiang Yuequan was born into a theatrical family, encountering many styles as a young man, and being particularly influenced by Beijing opera. Jiang's Suzhou tanci teachers included Zhang Yunting and Zhou Yuquan, and he was himself earning a living in this field by the mid-1930s, performing such traditional ballads as Zhenzhu ta ('Pearl Pagoda'). In 1951 Jiang joined the Shanghai People's Pingtan Troupe (Shanghai Shi Renmin Pingtan Gongzuotuan).

In the early 1940s, Jiang developed his own style by combining elements of Beijing opera (such as methods of pronunciation and breath control), Western singing and the basis of Zhou Yuquan's teachings. He continued to develop this style, in response to the demands of the stories he performed. For instance, in the early 1950s, he devised methods for representing the strength and heroism of various revolutionary characters, at the same time expanding his range of melodic variation, the better to express the many traditional romances characteristic of the tanci repertory. A representative ballad in the former category is Haishang yingxiong ('Heroes of the Sea'), while Du Shiniang and Yu qingting ('Jade Dragonfly') illustrate traditional love stories reworked by Jiang. His work in the development of an independent musical style has influenced singers in many other tanci schools.

Jig. Term used for several types of dance originating in the British Isles. The origin of the word is problematic; when used in connection with dance it may derive from Old French giguer ('to leap' or 'to gambol'). It contains the idea of a vigorous up and down movement, of which the dance is expressive. This is particularly true of the male solo dance; thus the English during the time of Elizabeth I described a Scottish jig as 'full of leapings' (J. Florio: A Worlde of Words, London, 1598) after the performance of the Scottish lords. This aristocratic form is distinct from the form resembling the hornpipe (see HORNPIPE (ii)) and is a variety of 'stepping': beating out intricate movements with the feet (usually, but not always, without movement of the body and arms). Although prevalent in the north of England the form of stepping identified in the jig has become associated particularly with Ireland, and has spread from both countries, through traders and immigrants, to the USA and Canada. Differing from this form of stepping, but somewhat resembling the Scottish form popularly regarded as 'highland dancing', are the 'pater-o-pee' and the morris jig. A fourth type is the scurrilous song and dance act or farce-jig developed in the late 16th century (see JIGG). Country dances called jigs in Playford's Dancing Master are figured dances of geometrical form but their tunes may, in some instances, derive from farce-jigs: for instance Nobody's Jig is the tune of the farce-jig Pickelherring, and Kemp's Jig is a variant of Rowland, the most famous of all farce-jigs performed by Will Kemp and the Earl of Leicester's players.

Until the early 19th century the terms jig, hornpipe and reel were used interchangeably, as none of them was a distinct form in either style or rhythm. The Scottish association continued in what was known as 'Scots measure' (2/4 as distinct from 3/2); similar dances for two male soloists were known as jigs in central Scotland, as strathspeys in northern Scotland and as Cumberlands south of the Scottish border where, as in Ireland, the two soloists were often of opposite sex, the woman's performance being the more subdued. By the end of the 17th century, however, the jig, although undefined, was associated with Ireland; and Tom d'Urfey's Choice New Songs (London, 1684) contains A Scotch Song made to the Irish Jigg. With the invention of infinite steps and tunes the jig (again, like the hornpipe) was taken up by the dancing schools in the 18th and 19th centuries and fostered by competitions and championships, evolving into a distinct form of stepping and acquiring the terminology of single and double jig, hop jig, slip jig and set-dance, each having its own measures.

Irish jig tunes, sometimes known as 'ports', can be either regular or irregular in structure and are played in 'double time': that is, each section is repeated. Regular jigs consist of two eight-bar sections; irregular tunes have sections of unequal length and are employed in set-dances, each dance having its own name and movement figures. Single and double jigs are in 6/8 time, the single jig containing two crotchet-quaver groups in each bar, the double jig containing two groups of triplets. Slip (or hop) jigs are in 9/8 time, each bar consisting of three groups of triplets. Single and double jigs are danced solo or with a partner of the opposite sex, as in those dances called Cumberlands; slip jigs, in which stepping is alternated with a promenade, as in the reel, are performed by couples dancing independently of other couples.

Country dances (also called 'long-dances' or 'rounds') for mixed couples are not termed step-dances, although they may employ jig steps and tunes in jig (or hornpipe, or reel) time. Music is usually provided by the union pipes or fiddle, but tunes called jigs (in 6/8 time in two regular eight-bar sections) are found among harp compositions by Carolan (1670–1738) and are regarded by some as imitations of Corelli's gigas (see IRELAND, §II, 5 and exx.1–3).

A similar but less elaborate form of stepping is found in the northern counties of England in solo clog dancing, of which tap-dancing is a stage variant. It is most commonly performed solo, and more often by men than by women. The posture of the body differs from the Irish rigidity, the arms being somewhat raised and the head and body tilted forward to preserve balance. Stepping in a stationary position is also executed in the 'rapper' sword dances of Durham and Northumberland. In rural areas of the Midlands and southern counties of England there is a form of jig sometimes called 'pater-o-pee' (a word, possibly 'franglais', descriptive of the light patting of the foot on the ground) which has some resemblance to the Scottish broad-sword dance. The rhythm is stepped over crossed whips, flails, sticks or churchwarden pipes, a feat of dexterity in which the dancer must preserve his own balance and the position of the objects laid on the ground. Another form is the morris jig performed with the usual steps of the morris dance accompanied by a counter-rhythm of arm and hand movements, sometimes emphasized by handkerchiefs held in each hand or a stick passed from hand to hand. Favourite jigs are Jockie to the Fair, Shepherd's Hey, Bacca-pipes and The Fool's Jig. These tunes are in 4/4, 2/2 or 6/8 time, usually consisting of two or three eight-bar sections repeated as required. In many jigs the time of one section will be augmented to permit the 'capers' or leaps which alternate with the figures and conclude the dance. Morris jigs are performed solo or by a number of soloists: three abreast successively repeating the figure, or four facing inwards. To perform the jig the dancer leaves the 'side' of six men and doffs the hat worn for set-dances and processional dances. Music was traditionally provided by the pipe and tabor until well into the 19th century, when the fiddle or concertina replaced them.

Pieces entitled 'jig', 'jigg' or 'gigge', although of no definite character, are found in early instrumental methods and were used as themes for keyboard variations. For example, in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book are A Gigge by Byrd (no.181); A Gigge, My Selfe and A Gigge both by Bull (nos.189, 190); and A Gigge by Farnaby (no.267). Others are derived from songs in farce-jigs: in the same collection are Farnaby's Nobody's Gigge (no.149) and Rowland or Rolandston, which also appears in My Lady Nevell's Book, Will Forster's Virginal Book, Robinson's Schoole and elsewhere up to Bach's Choralgesänge (no.371, 'Keinen hat Gott verlassen') of 1765. The majority of such identifiable jigs, however, are in Dutch collections such as J.J. Starter's Friesche Lust-hof (Amsterdam, 1621). The jig was also accepted into the dance suite, finding its place as the final movement (see R.

Cotgrave: A Dictionarie of the French and English Tongues, London, 1611, under 'Farce').

MARGARET DEAN-SMITH

Jigg [jig, jygge]. A stage entertainment popular in England and on the Continent (Holland, Germany, Scandinavia) from about 1550 to 1750. The jigg 'combined three arts in which the Elizabethans delighted and excelled – drama, music and the dance', though it was aimed at the 'groundlings, not the literati' of Elizabethan society (Baskervill). The jigg derives from a combination of the improvised popular songs of earlier centuries with the even older traditional ritual dances associated with the important festivals of the year. Some of the latter, for harvest festivals, with sung dialogue, mime and dance, survived until the end of the 19th century. The frequent use of the terms 'Northern jigg' and 'Scottish jigg' suggests that it may have originated in the more northerly parts of Great Britain; in the Hebrides a similar kind of folk art persisted into the 20th century.

By the middle of the 16th century the jigg had assumed its standard form: a short burlesque comedy for two to five characters, sung in verse to one or more well-known tunes, interspersed with much lively dancing and performed by a team of professional comedians. The first reference to a London stage performance of a jigg is in 1582, and the first entry of a printed jigg was made on the Stationers' Register in 1591. But there is little doubt that jiggs were being acted in England and on the Continent many years earlier than this.

Nicholas Tarleton, one of the greatest of Elizabethan comedians, was largely responsible for setting the form of the jigg and for making it fashionable on the London stage. His pupils and successors, William Kemp (who in 1586 led the Earl of Leicester's players when they visited Copenhagen and subsequently Saxony), Sackville, Spencer and Reynolds, transported the vogue for jiggs to the Continent, and by 1598 the German playwright Jakob Ayrer had written and published many Singspiele directly modelled on the English jiggs performed by the companies of English strolling players. In the London theatre from 1590 to 1625 a jigg was the recognized way of ending a more serious entertainment, and jiggs were even performed between the acts of a tragedy or history. During the early years of the 17th century the jigg tended more and more to bawdry rather than wit, and the better-class London theatres (Bankside, Globe) left the presentation of jiggs to their rival concerns (Curtain, Red Bull, Fortune). So notoriously rowdy did the jiggs become at the Fortune Theatre, in fact, that in 1612 the Middlesex Justices of the Peace issued an order banning them throughout the country – not that the ban seems to have been very effectively carried out. By 1625 the jigg was becoming transformed into either a more formal song-and-dance act (partly as a result of the influence of the court masque; a clear line of development runs from this kind of jigg down to the 'English operas' of Locke, Christopher Gibbons and Purcell) or else a prose farce or 'droll' (this form persisted to the late 18th century, often taking the form of a 'potted' version of a straight play). Traces of the earlier jigg tradition can also be detected in the popularity of the jig as a Restoration dance, and in the acted ballad of the type represented by D'Urfey's Pray now John let Jug prevail (from his play The Wonders in the Sun). By this time the jigg proper was obsolete in England, though a degenerate version of the most famous of all jiggs, Pickelherring, was performed at Dresden as late as 1683 and in Stockholm in 1733. The last trace of its influence is perhaps the music hall song-and-dance act.

Much of the evidence for the history and development of the jigg is purely circumstantial and must be pieced together very laboriously from many sources. The majority of early jiggs, printed and manuscript, are lost; no jiggs were entered on the Stationers' Register from 1595 to 1623; no jiggs in English dating from 1600 to 1650 are extant; of the 36 jiggs printed at the end of Baskervill's study 17 are broadside ballads, 12 are in German or Dutch and only seven are in anything like an English acting version. The tunes to which the jiggs were performed are sometimes not recorded at all, sometimes identifiable only after much search, and sometimes printed in astonishingly corrupt versions. As for the way in which the tunes were performed, the evidence is once again disappointingly meagre. One of the best-known jigg comedians, Spencer, had 19 actors and 16 musicians in his troupe in 1611, but this seems to have been an unusually large number and not typical of the average company. There is good reason to believe that some at least of the consort lessons of Morley (1599, 2/1611) and Rosseter (1609), and the manuscript pieces for the same combination in the University Library, Cambridge, were used by or written for the jigg companies. Some of the pieces in GB-Lbl Add.15117 may also be related to this tradition. The instruments used in the Morley and Rosseter pieces were all portable; acting companies are known to have owned sets of instruments of the right kind; and many of the tunes themselves were in common use as jigg tunes. Known jigg tunes include Go from my window, Fortune my foe, Walsingham, Rowland (also called Neighbour Robert and Lord Willoughby's Welcome Home), The Spanish Pavan, Sellengers Round, The Hunt is Up, Watkins Ale, Tarleton's Willy, Kemp's Jigg and others; all these may be found in one or other of the collections listed above, and the German version of the jigg called Rowland, published in 1599, states that the tune is 'Zu gebrauchen auff allerley Instrumenten'. A survey of the instrumental repertory in printed books and manuscripts of the period 1590–1630 shows that over the whole of northern and north-western Europe the amateur – and even the semi-professional – musician was playing the same tunes, whether he was English, Dutch or German, and there seems little doubt that the jigg was the medium through which very many of these tunes were disseminated.

THURSTON DART/MICHAEL TILMOUTH

Jílek, František (b Brno, 22 May 1913; d Brno, 16 Sept 1993). Czech conductor. He studied under Jaroslav Kvapil and Chalabala at Brno, and Novák at Prague. He was a répétiteur with the Brno Opera (1936–9) and then conductor of the Ostrava Opera (1939–48) where the director, Jaroslav Vogel, was an authority on Janáček. Jílek returned to the Brno Opera in 1948, becoming head of opera (1952–78). There he continued the Janáček tradition and was instrumental in producing the complete operas at the 1958 festival. The première of Fate won special acclaim, along with From the House of the Dead, pioneer performances of Prokofiev's The Fiery Angel and War and Peace, and Martinů's The Greek Passion. After retiring from the Brno Opera he was chief conductor of the Brno State PO (1978–83), where he continued to specialize in the works of Janáček and Novák, and in contemporary music. Jílek also appeared in many European centres, often giving the first local performances of Janáček. His interpretations were characterized by detailed working of the score, fusing timbre and expressiveness into a musical and dramatic whole. He taught conducting at the Janáček Academy in Brno, and wrote 'Poznámky k instrumentaci Janáčkových oper' (Notes on the instrumentation of Janáček's operas) for the JAMU collection (Brno, 1965).

Jiménez, José. See XIMÉNEZ, JOSÉ.

Jiménez Mabarak, Carlos (b Tacuba, 31 Jan 1916; d Mexico City, 21 June 1994). Mexican composer. He graduated in composition from the conservatory in Brussels, also earning a premier prix in piano, and studied in Rome (with Turchi), Mexico City (with Revueltas) and later in Paris (with Leibowitz). The publication of his Allegro romántico (Brussels, 1935) signalled the start of a prolific career. In 1961 he won the coveted Ariel prize for the film score for Deseada (with E. Hernández Moncada), and was thereafter in constant demand in Mexican cinema. He was awarded further prizes for his scores for Veneno para las hadas (1961) and Los recuerdos del porvenir (1969). He was also a key figure in the revival of the Mexican modern dance movement: his Balada del venado y de la luna and El paraíso de los ahogados are considered cornerstones of the repertory. He wrote two operas: Misa de seis ('Mass at Six o'Clock') and La güera ('The Blonde'). These works, together with Bernal Jiménez's Tata Vasco and Moncayo's La mulata de Córdoba, are the most characteristic of 20th-century Mexican operas.

Other landmarks in Jiménez Mabarak's career include the first prize in the music competition for the 1968 Mexico City Olympic Games and the National Arts Prize, which he was awarded by the Mexican government in 1994. He taught composition at the National Conservatory (1942–68) and during his later years at the Escuela Nacional de Música.

Jiménez Mabarak's music underwent an interesting evolution, from an early style full of Spanish reminiscences to a modern language. A pioneer of dodecaphonic technique and electronic music in Mexico, he produced in El paraíso de los ahogados and above all in Misa de seis two of the most advanced Mexican scores of the time. However, Jiménez Mabarak did not wish to separate himself from the wider environment, and his later works are in a more classical style. In his own words, 'the discipline of a more conventional language allows me the greater possibility of freedom'. La güera, Sala de retratos and all his later works employed a tonal language enriched not only by elements of Mexican folklore but also by complex chromatic textures. Jingle. A short musical composition designed to promote a product, normally with text but sometimes purely instrumental. A jingle typically combines a simple couplet or quatrain of easily remembered, rhyming advertising copy with a melodic 'hook' that will implant itself in the listener's memory and carry its commercial message with it. For that reason, in most jingles, the product's name strategically coincides with the catchiest element of the hook. Though generally considered aural phenomena, in the late 19th century some jingles with musical notation appeared on trade cards, in sheet music and even in periodical advertisements; but radio and television provided a far more effective method of dissemination. The first broadcast jingle was for Wheaties breakfast cereal (1929), while the first nationally promoted jingle in the USA, 'Pepsi-Cola Hits the Spot', appeared in the early 1940s. Some jingles have become hit songs, notably 'I'd like to buy the world a Coke' (as 'I'd like to teach the world to sing', 1973); conversely, some popular songs have been pressed into service as jingles, including 'Let's face the music and dance' for Allied-Dunbar Insurance (1995) and 'Tall Cool One' for Coca-Cola (1988).

Jingles (Fr. grelots; Ger. Schellen; It. sonagli). The name given to a cluster of small bells, such as sleigh bells (see BELL (i)), arranged either on a strap or a loop of wire, or on a wooden handle (in the Hornbostel and Sachs system they are classified as shaken idiophones). Jingles (with isolated exceptions) are indefinite in pitch, since the unit is made up of bells of varying size and sound. They are shaken to produce a tremolo, or such rhythmic patterns as may be prescribed. For an extremely delicate sound the player may tap the bells on the palm of the hand. Jingles, as called for in the orchestra, should not be confused with finger cymbals or with the metal discs on a tambourine, which are also termed 'jingles'. Walton calls for the player to 'flick the jingles' of the tambourine in his Façade (1921–2).

Small bells and tinkling pieces were known in ancient times. In Sumer, Babylonia, Assyria and Egypt they were commonly suspended from the trappings of horses, mules and camels, as for instance the bells on horses mentioned in the Old Testament (Zechariah xiv.20). Strings of metal pellet bells (ghaṇṭī) are worn on the ankles, etc. by South Asian traditional and classical dancers (see INDIA, §IX).

In the Western orchestra, jingles are used imitatively; to punctuate rhythmic sequences; and as tone-colour. Only on the rarest occasions (except for their former use in vaudeville) are specific pitches prescribed, the most notable example being Mozart's use of Schlitten-Schellen (c″–e″–f″–g″–a″) in the third of his Three German Dances K605. As grelots they occur in Adolphe Adam's Le postillon de Lonjumeau (1836). Other composers to score for jingles in various forms include Mahler in his Symphony no.4 (1892–1900), Elgar in Cockaigne (1900–01; harness bells), Ireland (A London Overture, 1936), Vaughan Williams (A London Symphony, 1912–13, rev. 1933) and Respighi (Feste romane, 1928). At the end of the 20th century, chromatic sleigh bells, with a range of two octaves (c′–c‴) were available.

Jiráčková, Marta (b Kladno, 22 March 1932). Czech composer. She studied composition at the Prague Conservatory (1952–8) with Emil Hlobil and later (1962–4) with Alois Hába, whose teaching, together with her friendship with Sláva Vorlová, proved significant to her development as a composer. She undertook postgraduate study at the Janáček Academy of Musical Arts in Brno with Ctirad Kohoutek and particularly Alois Piňos (1976–8). For more than 30 years she has worked as a music editor for Czechoslovak Radio in Prague, an experience which has encouraged her to write electro-acoustic music. Most of this music is for film and radio but it also includes a ballet, Lod' bláznů ('The Ship of Fools', 1991), which won a Czech Music Fund prize. Jiráčková enjoys writing for the human voice, which she treats as an instrument, but her output covers a wide range of genres and includes educational music. (ČSHS)

ANNA ŠERÝCH

Jirák, K(arel) B(oleslav) (b Prague, 28 Jan 1891; d Chicago, 30 Jan 1972). Czech composer. He read law and philosophy at Prague University and concurrently studied composition privately with Novák (1909–11) and Foerster (1911–12). After a brief appointment as chorus master at the Vinohrady Theatre, Prague, Jirák worked at the Hamburg Opera (1915–18); he was then director of the Brno and Moravská Ostrava operas (1918–20) and, in 1920–21, conductor of the Prague choir Hlahol and second conductor of the Czech PO. In the 1920s and 30s he contributed essays and reviews to many newspapers and journals, and was prominent in the administration of the ISCM. He was also head of the music department of Czech Radio (1930–45) and a successful teacher at the Prague Conservatory; among his pupils were Ježek, Havelka Kabeláč, Slavický, František Bartoš and Iša Krejčí. In 1947 Jirák left for the USA at the invitation of Roosevelt College, Chicago, where he became professor of theory and composition. He was awarded the Czech State Prize (1928, for the Second Quartet and the Wind Quintet), the first prize of the Smetana Foundation (for the Symphonic Variations) and a prize at the Edinburgh Festival (1951, for the Symphony no.5).

During World War I Jirák was already a renowned composer within what would become Czechoslovakia. The most remarkable of his early works is the opera Apollonius z Tyany, later retitled Žena a bůh ('A Woman and a God'). In Hamburg he completed his First Symphony and composed numerous songs of a lyrical, subjective character that show his affinity with Mahler. The piano cycle Na rozhraní ('On the Boundary', 1923) initiated a new phase, in which he was associated with the Czech avant garde, attempting to create a synthesis of the tradition of Smetana, Fibich, Suk and Novák with experiments in sound. After his arrival in the United States Jirák changed nothing in his style of composition; essentially he remained a profound and convinced lyricist. Although this late Romantic disposition dominated his music's character, his thorough knowledge of prevailing trends in new music enabled him to modify his technique which – though not precisely ground-breaking or pioneering, rationally constructivist or highlighting a single approach – remained neither eclectic nor conservative. Important compositions of Jirák's American period include his fifth and sixth symphonies, the last four string quartets, the Piano Sonata no.2 and the Requiem for soloists, chorus and orchestra.

MILAN KUNA

Jiránek, Jaroslav (b Prague, 21 Aug 1922). Czech musicologist. While still at secondary school he graduated as a pianist from Prague Conservatory and later attended the master classes of Václav Štěpán (1943) and Ilona Štěpánová-Kurzová (1947). After the reopening of the Czech universities, he studied philosophy and aesthetics at Prague University (1945–8), where he obtained the doctorate with a dissertation on Masaryk and historical materialism. During his university studies he abandoned his piano career and devoted himself to cultural-political activity and to music criticism. After 1948 he helped to re-establish Czech musical life according to Marxist cultural-political principles: he acted as temporary head of the Czech radio programme department (1950–52), and then as one of the leading personalities of the Czechoslovak Composers' Union became chief editor of the union's journal, Hudební rozhledy (1953–60). About the same time he devoted more of his time to musicology, first in the Cabinet for the Study of the Works of Zdeněk Nejedlý and later (after 1962) in the newly formed musicology institute of the Czech Academy of Sciences. He was head of this institute until 1972, when he returned to the Nejedlý Cabinet. From 1961 to 1971 he was chief editor of the academy's journal, Hudební věda, and was a part-time lecturer at the musicology department of Prague University. His teaching was limited by the fall of Dubček and its political consequences: he worked at the Institute for Czech Literature from 1972, and only in 1982 was he allowed to return to music teaching and musicological work, at the Institute for the Theory and History of Music (1982–4). He also became lecturer (1982) and professor (1990) at the Academy of Musical Arts, and in 1992 he was made professor of musicology at Olomouc University.

Jiranek established himself as a leading Czechoslovak Marxist-orientated musicologist, specializing in the methodology of musicology and in the history of Czech music of the 19th and 20th centuries. He has studied the music of composers including Fibich, Janáček and Smetana; he is editor-in-chief of the series Dílo a život Bedřicha Smetany (Prague, 1978–) and has contributed to the complete edition of Fibich's works. He has also worked intensively on semantics and semiotics, and the development and systemization of the Intonatsiya theory of the Soviet scholar Boris Asaf'yev and in 1966 he obtained the DSc, with a work on the genesis and significance of Asaf'yev's theory.

JOSEF BEK/R

Jirásek, Jan (b Rychnov nad Kneznou, 9 Jan 1955). Czech composer. He studied theory, composition (with Zouhar) and electronic music at the Brno Academy, and in 1983 was appointed editor-producer at Czechoslovak Radio in Prague. In 1996 he was awarded a Fulbright Fellowship to teach at the University of Colorado at Boulder. His works have been performed at the Bourges, Stockholm, Paris (UNESCO) and Linz international festivals of electro-acoustic music and at the Münchener Biennale, which commissioned from Jirásek the percussion piece Bread and Circuses. His St Luke Passion, commissioned by the Kulturzentrum Gasteig in Munich, is a reconstruction of Carl Orff's lost stage version of the Lukaspassion attributed to J.S. Bach (which survives only in manuscript). His musical language is based on simple material incorporated into sophisticated musical structures. He absorbs a wide range of stylistic elements, including those of extra-European cultures and genres such as folk, pop, rock and film music. He received the prize of the Czech Music Fund in 1991, and in 1998 was awarded the Czech Lion for his contribution to film music.

MIROSLAV PUDLÁK

Jirko, Ivan (b Prague, 7 Oct 1926; d Prague, 20 Aug 1978). Czech composer and critic. He read medicine at Prague University, concurrently studying composition with Karel Janeček (1944–9) and Bořkovec (1949–52). He worked as a psychiatrist from 1951 to 1971, and was also a music critic for Prague newspapers. From 1974 to 1978 he was lecturer at the Prague Academy of Performing Arts; from 1976 he was opera dramaturg at the National Theatre. Jirko was secretary of the Přítomnost association for contemporary music and a committee member of the Union of Czech and Czechoslovak Composers. His articles in Tempo, Rytmus and Hudební rozhledy deal principally with the aesthetics of musical socialist realism.

For more than 25 years Jirko worked at creating a highly individual musical expression rooted in neoclassicism. His music is cast in extended forms that follow examples of Shostakovich and Bořkovec, but it also shows melodic influences from Czech folksong. The vocabulary of his music is predominantly tonal, in the broadest sense of the term, while his settings are concise and formally well-founded. Many works convey a sense of brightness and optimism.

Jitterbug. A technique applied to various kinds of social dance, involving its performance in an informal, violent or unconventional manner, particularly to syncopated music. From the 1910s such dances became more acrobatic and improvised, first among blacks at ballrooms such as the Savoy in Harlem (New York); later they were performed in modified or more formal versions throughout North America, Europe and westernized parts of Asia.

Jive. Black American urban popular music of the 1940s. The word has many meanings in black American usage, and may derive from the Wolof word jev, meaning 'to talk disparagingly', a usage it retains in the USA. It is also applied to witty or deceitful speech, to a form of stylized jitterbugging or athletic dancing, and to marijuana. In black American music it was especially applied to the lightweight, rhythmic form of 'hokum' blues popular in the 1940s during the swing era. Although the words of jive songs were often insinuating, witty, sophisticated or sly, the music was associated with 'good times'. Its principal exponent was the much recorded singer and alto saxophonist Louis Jordan, whose You run your mouth and I'll run my business (1940, Decca), The chick's too young to fry (1945, Decca), Let the good times roll (1945, Decca) and Saturday Night Fish Fry (1949, Bruns.) show a typically extroverted style. Other jive artists included Phil Moore, whose I'm gonna see my baby (1944, Vic.) is a patriotic wartime piece, and the white pianist Harry 'the Hipster' Gibson, who made a number of outrageous songs, including Who put the benzedrine in Mrs. Murphy's Ovaltine? (1944, Musicraft). Although jive as such declined, it survived as a vein in the rhythm-and-blues idiom, particularly through the recordings of Wynonie Harris, for example Grandma plays the numbers (1948, King) and Bloodshot Eyes (1951, King).

PAUL OLIVER

Jo, Sumi (b Seoul, 22 Nov 1962). Korean soprano. She studied in Italy, making her début in 1986 at Trieste as Gilda. In 1988 she sang Thetis/Fortune in Jommelli's Fetonte at La Scala, and Barbarina at Salzburg, where she returned as Oscar (1989) and the Queen of Night (1993). In 1990 she made her US début in Chicago as the Queen of Night, a role she has subsequently sung to acclaim at Los Angeles, Florence and Covent Garden (1993), where her previous roles included Olympia (1991), Adina (L'elisir d'amore) and Elvira in I puritani (1992). Jo's repertory also embraces Zerbinetta, Sister Constance (Dialogues des Carmélites), Matilde (Elisabetta, regina d'Inghilterra), Strauss's Sophie, Amina (La sonnambula) and Countess Adèle (Le comte Ory), which she sang at Aix-en-Provence in 1995. Her pure-toned and extremely flexible coloratura soprano is used with great musicality, as she demonstrates in several Rossini recordings and her three recordings of the Queen of Night under Jordan, Solti and Östman.

ELIZABETH FORBES

Joachim [née Schneeweiss], Amalie (b Marburg an der Drau [now Maribor, Slovenia], 10 May 1839; d Berlin, 3 Feb 1899). Austrian mezzo-soprano, later contralto. She made her stage début in Troppau at the age of 14, and after appearing in Hermannstadt she sang at the Vienna Hofoper, 1854–62 the Kärtnertortheater, making her début there as Rezia (Oberon). In 1862 she was engaged at the Hoftheater, Hanover, where she was acclaimed for her performances of Gluck's Orpheus, Fidès (Le prophète) and Beethoven's Leonore.

In 1863 she married the violinist Joseph Joachim, who insisted that she retire from the stage. After moving to Berlin she continued to sing in concerts and acquired such a reputation in oratorio and lieder that Bruch wrote the alto parts in his oratorios Odysseus and Achilles for her. She made a name above all as an interpreter of Schumann and Brahms, giving the first performances of a whole series of the latter's vocal works, including the version for 4 voices of the Zigeunerlieder; she was a tireless promoter of the Alto Rhapsody, although it was first performed by Pauline Viardot. She also gave the premières of the orchestral versions of Mahler's Einsame Schildwacht and Verlorene Müh (Berlin, 1892). Her repertory embraced the entire contemporary lieder literature, including works by Wolf and Richard Strauss, and she also championed a large repertory of traditional and folk-influenced song. Besides her extensive concert appearances she taught singing, first in Munich, then at the Philipp Scharwenka Institut in Berlin, and finally in her own singing school.

BEATRIX BORCHARD

Joachim, Joseph (b Kitsee, nr Pressburg [now Bratislava], 28 June 1831; d Berlin, 15 Aug 1907). Austro-Hungarian violinist, composer, conductor and teacher. He was born on the Esterházy estates into a Jewish family which moved in 1833 to Pest. His talent was recognized at an early age and systematically nurtured. His first teacher was the leader of the Pest Opera Orchestra, Serwaczyński, with whom Joachim made his public début at the Adelskasino in Pest, on 17 March 1839. He went to Vienna to play first for Hauser and then for Georg Hellmesberger the elder, and took lessons from Joseph Böhm, a former pupil of Rode, himself taught by Viotti, both of whom adhered to the classical French school.

By the age of 12 his technique was fully developed, and in early 1843 he began studying with Mendelssohn in Leipzig. The meeting with Mendelssohn was so decisive for the young Joachim that his life can be understood in terms of a mission to promote Mendelssohn's work. The composer arranged for Joachim to receive composition tuition from Hauptmann, and also a good general education. After a successful début playing Bériot's Adagio and Rondo at the Leipzig Gewandhaus in August 1843, Joachim was taken by Mendelssohn to London, where he played Beethoven's Violin Concerto to tremendous acclaim in May 1844. Thereafter the concerto was inextricably linked with Joachim and, with the exception of the Bach D minor Chaconne, it became the work he performed most often.

On Mendelssohn's death in 1847 Joachim experienced a deep crisis. Despite being deputy leader of the Gewandhaus Orchestra and a teacher at the Leipzig Conservatory, he decided to undertake further study with Liszt in Weimar. Like Mendelssohn, Liszt spent many hours making music with Joachim, and also encouraged his composing (the Violin Concerto in G minor op.3 and the overture to Demetrius op.6 are both dedicated to Liszt). In Weimar Joachim gave his first chamber concerts, which included a performance of Beethoven's 'Kreutzer' Sonata with Hans von Bülow in 1852. From 1853 to 1868 Joachim was principal violinist at the Hanover Court, and also appeared regularly in England, Belgium and the Netherlands; in 1855 he founded his first string quartet. The Hanover years were his most prolific as a composer, most of his 56 completed works dating from this period. Crucial events at this time included his baptism as a Lutheran, his close friendship with the Schumanns and Brahms and consequent rejection of Liszt and the New German School, his decision to abandon composing, and his marriage in 1863 to the mezzo-soprano Amalie Schneeweiss.

In 1868 Joachim and his wife moved to Berlin, where Joachim set up a school of instrumental music in the Königliche Akademie der Künste (from 1872 the Königliche Hochschule für Musik), and set his stamp on Berlin's musical life through his work as a teacher and through his various concert series, notably his quartet recitals over a span of 40 years with colleagues from the Hochschule (see JOACHIM QUARTET). The Hochschule grew rapidly to include an orchestra which Joachim conducted in public concerts. However, Joachim's opposition to Liszt and Wagner during his years at the Hochschule gained the establishment a reputation as rigid and reactionary. Joachim shared his artistic outlook with Brahms, and they admired each other's work, but with Brahms siding with Amalie when the Joachims divorced in 1884 the friendship cooled. Joachim nevertheless continued to promote Brahms's music and was responsible for the first performances of many of Brahms's chamber works, introducing them also to England.

Joachim's paramount importance as an interpreter in the second half of the 19th century stems partly from his direct contact with many leading composers of the day. Like Clara Schumann among pianists, he represented a new species of 'ascetic' violinist, subordinating himself to the composer rather than glorying in his virtuoso technique. This philosophy drew him inevitably to chamber music. As a soloist he concentrated on just a handful of works: Bach's solo sonatas, the violin concertos of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Viotti and Spohr, and his own concertos, notably the Konzert in ungarischer Weise op.11. It was Joachim who initiated entire recitals devoted to string quartets, and in them he presented the entire classical repertory, from Haydn to Brahms.

The few extant recordings of Joachim's playing, from 1903 (see illustration), document his subtle command of rubato, his long-arched phrasing and his sparing use of vibrato. Many works were written for him, such as Schumann's Violin Concerto and Phantasie op.131, and Brahms's Violin Concerto (on which he collaborated) and Double Concerto. His own compositions, admired by Liszt, Schumann and Brahms, were predominantly sombre in character. They reveal, especially in the overtures, a mastery of orchestration, and have a distinctive tone of voice – somewhere between the introspective poetry of Schumann and Liszt's programme music; according to Tovey, Joachim defined his style using the term 'psychological music'. His own violin concertos pose such formidable technical demands that, in spite of their musical value, they have completely disappeared from the repertory. Joachim also contributed to many musical editions, including one of the Bach solo violin sonatas.

BEATRIX BORCHARD

Joachim, Otto (b Düsseldorf, 13 Oct 1910). Canadian composer and viola player of German birth. He was a violin pupil of Julius Buths in Düsseldorf (1916–28) and completed his training with Hermann Zitzmann in Cologne (1928–31). He emigrated to China in 1934 and stayed in the region for 15 years, working in Singapore and Shanghai as a music teacher and performer. In 1949 he settled permanently in Montreal, and in 1957 he became a Canadian citizen. He played the viola in the Montreal SO (1952–65), the McGill Chamber Orchestra (1959–66) and the Montreal String Quartet (1955–61). Joachim taught the violin, the viola, chamber music and early music at the McGill Conservatorium (1956–64) and the Quebec Conservatory (1956–77). He founded and directed the Montreal Consort of Ancient Instruments (active 1958–68) and has built replicas of various medieval instruments including a psaltery, a rebec, a fiddle and two portative organs. Joachim was made a Chevalier of the Ordre National de Québec (1993) and received an honorary doctorate from Concordia University (1994).

Underlying all of Joachim's work as a composer is a concern for writing music that has something to say and is rewarding to perform. His early symphonic poem, Asia (1928–39), which is in a Romantic tonal style and shows some oriental influence, received its première in Montreal in 1997. Virtually all of Joachim's works since 1953 have used 12-note techniques. In 1994 he stated: 'I am known as a 12-tone composer. I do not reject it. I swear to it'. Serial techniques were applied solely to pitch in the 1950s, but subsequently governed other compositional aspects, including aleatory procedures and graphic notation. The String Quartet (1956), one of Joachim's most frequently performed works, is a powerful and convincing synthesis of 12-note techniques and tonal procedures, and every bar betrays the hand of an experienced string player. The third movement of the Nonet (1960), his first aleatory work, is created by taping the first movement and playing it in reverse, a process logically extending the mirror structures he explored in earlier 12-note works. In Illuminations I (1965) and II (1969) the musicians play only when the conductor makes a light shine on their part; tempo and dynamics are guided by the intensity of light, controlled by dimmer switches. Similar lighting effects are used in Mankind (1972), a multimedia work in which representatives of four religious faiths read scriptural texts about peace. Mobile für Johann Sebastian Bach (1985) is a tercentenary tribute based on a speech addressed by Joachim to Bach which is taped and altered electronically, and accompanied by an instrumental ensemble whose music is based on the B–A–C–H motive (and a row derived from it) and a Bach chorale prelude.

Joachim Quartet. German string quartet. It was founded in Berlin in 1869 by the violinist Joseph Joachim, director of the Hochschule für Musik for many years. Together with colleagues from the Hochschule für Musik, Joachim gave a concert series each winter in the Berlin Singakademie for close to four decades. Ernst Schiever was second violinist from 1869 to 1872, followed by Heinrich de Ahna (1872–92), Johann Kruse (1892–7) and Carl Halir (1897–1907); de Ahna, the original viola player, was succeeded by Eduard Rappoldi (1872–7), Emanuel Wirth (1877–1906) and Karl Klingler (1906–7), while the quartet's cellists were Wilhelm Müller (1869–79) and Robert Hausmann (1879–1907). The viola player sat opposite rather than next to the second violinist and, unusually for the time, the group functioned almost exclusively as a quartet, only rarely adding a second viola or second cello.

The annual series of concerts in Berlin were the highlights of the city's musical life, the programmes aiming 'to educate the nation' as well as to provide a 'model for students and enjoyment for the public'. The quartet also played frequently in Vienna and no German music festival was considered complete without their presence. Visits abroad included Paris, Budapest and Rome, where they gave a complete cycle of Beethoven quartets in the Palazzo Farnese in 1905. Though Joachim played regularly with Reiss, Straus and Piatti at the London Monday Popular Concerts, he did not perform with his Berlin quartet in England until 1900. They appeared annually until 1904 in St James's Hall and moved to the Bechstein (now Wigmore) Hall in 1905. In 1906 they gave the complete chamber works of Brahms in the Queen's Hall.

Moser wrote of the quartet's fine shading, unanimity of conception and astounding blend of the voices (in part due to their fine Stradivari instruments) as well as the subordination of the individual to the whole ensemble, which still allowed for freedom of expression. Recitals featured works by Joachim's Berlin colleagues and programmes devoted entirely to Beethoven (their performances of the late Beethoven quartets being legendary) and Joachim established a canon of chamber music that embraced the complete quartets of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann and Brahms.

João IV, King of Portugal (b Vila Viçosa, 19 March 1604; d Lisbon, 6 Nov 1656). Portuguese ruler, collector of music, writer on music and composer. As heir to the dukedom of Bragança, whose ruling family was notable for its love of music, he received a thorough musical education; his first teacher was Robert Tornar (or Torgh), an English (or possibly Irish) composer who had been a disciple of Gery de Ghersem and Mathieu Rosmarin at the Royal Flemish Chapel in Madrid. After Portugal's successful rebellion in 1640 against Spanish rule, he was chosen king. His reign was marked by intermittent war with Spain and by Portugal's efforts to secure foreign alliances, but he was little interested in politics. He was, however, ardently devoted to music, generous in support of composers and musical establishments in his realm and constantly in touch with distinguished musicians.

João IV assembled the largest music library of his time, based on the ducal library of his father and grandfather. Its treasures unfortunately perished in the Lisbon earthquake and fire of 1 November 1755 but are partly recorded in the catalogue printed in Lisbon in 1649. Though only the first volume of a projected set, this catalogue is astonishing: its 521 pages list many hundreds of volumes of masses, motets, Magnificat settings, psalms, madrigals, chansons, villancicos, airs, instrumental pieces and theoretical treatises with detailed descriptions of more than 2000 prints and 4000 individual manuscript compositions, ranging from the early 16th century to the late 1640s. It can be safely estimated that this represented less than a third of the total contents of the library at the time of João's death. Whereas his acquisition policy concerning printed editions was to obtain a copy of nearly every new volume published by Gardano, Vincenti, Plantin and all the major music publishers in Europe, his choice of the manuscript repertory shows a clear preference for the followers of Palestrina in the Roman school, as well for the disciples of Philippe Rogier in Madrid and the main representatives of all cathedral schools in Spain and Portugal. It is tantalizing to read of the many works no longer extant, for example the tientos of Pedro Vila and Bernardo Clavijo de Castillo, the ensaladas of Mateo Flecha and the masses of Peter Philips. The catalogue is also an essential source of bibliographical information regarding music printing in Europe, as well as of data concerning the compositional conventions of Latin and vernacular church polyphony in the Iberian Peninsula between the early 16th and the mid-17th century.

As a writer on music João is known by two brief publications, a defence of the expressive power of the stile antico and a response to criticisms of a Palestrina mass. Both were published in Spanish and Italian without place, date or authorship, but prefatory sonnets give the king's title in acrostics. The Defensa was prompted by a letter printed almost a century earlier expressing the widely current dissatisfaction with the polyphonic style and its lack of emotional power by comparison with the music of the ancients. João's defence ignored the truly modern music of his time, which sought to recapture the power of ancient music through monody: in arguments not always logical or coherent he defended the music of Palestrina, Victoria and their contemporaries, cast doubts on the alleged power of ancient music (much of which, he said, stemmed from the words) and indicated that emotional extremes were hardly appropriate to the ordinary service of worship. In the Respuestas he defended the modal purity of a Palestrina mass; his arguments show a wide knowledge of both the theory and the repertory of liturgical music. Two manuscript treatises in Portuguese attributed to him by earlier writers are no longer extant; they may have been destroyed with his library.

João was by far the foremost individual patron of music and musicians in 17th-century Portugal. He sponsored the publication of Duarte Lobo's polyphonic works by Plantin (Antwerp) and of João Lourenço Rebelo's by Balmonti (Rome), as well as the printing of several volumes of the music of Manuel Cardoso and Filipe de Magalhães by Paulo Craesbeeck, a former assistant of Plantin established in Lisbon. His patronage also had a decisive role in the careers of such important Spanish composers of his time as Carlos Patiño and Mathieu Rosmarin. João was also active as a composer, but only two short four-part motets, that were attributed to him already in the mid-18th century, survive complete. Both are in the stile antico, with strict treatment of dissonance, and proclaim a devotion to the Palestrina style.

Job. Subject of the Old Testament book of Job, a symbol of patience in adversity, and patron of music in the 15th and 16th centuries. The book of Job, arguably the most penetratingly philosophical of the Old Testament books, was composed by an unknown author probably in the post-exilic period. Traditionally it has been read as the story of Job, a just man visited by extreme misfortunes that his friends interpret as punishments for sin, but who is eventually vindicated by the appearance of God. Modern scholarship sees Job as more querulous and God's punishments as more mysterious, and the poetic epilogue in which Job's vindication takes place as being incompatible with the prose body of the text.

The only references to music appear in xxi.2: 'They sing to the timbrel and harp, Revel to the tune of flute' and xxx.31: 'My harp is turned to mourning, My flute to the sound of weepers'. There is nothing in these lines to account for Job's becoming a patron of music. Each of the passages merely refers to music as one among many amenities in the life of a wealthy Middle Eastern landowner in ancient times. In the first, Job is referring to the prosperity of unjust men not afflicted by God as he is, and in the second he alludes to his own fall from prosperity. Accordingly, neither the early Christian centuries nor the Middle Ages looked upon Job as a patron of music even though he was a much venerated figure. He is the subject of Gregory the Great's often copied and much imitated Magna moralia in Job, and readings from the book of Job occupy a central position in the Office of the Dead, where they served to make Job an important medieval symbol of patience and life after death. Medieval art in turn represented Job quite frequently. Most typically he appears as a naked figure, his body covered with sores, seated on a dunghill and being berated by his three friends, Eliphaz, Bildad and Zophar.

Job finally emerged as a musical figure in the 15th century, when he was adopted as patron of a number of musical guilds and was represented in works of art with a musical theme. In the latter he continued to be pictured seated on the dunghill, but in place of the traditional Eliphaz, Bildad and Zophar are three musicians; they seek to console him with their playing and are rewarded with a piece of Job's skin which is magically transformed into a gold coin (see illustration). While the precise steps leading to the transformation of Job into a figure of musical significance cannot be traced, it is possible to determine the broad outline. The immediate influence was that of the 15th-century mystery plays, in particular the Job rewarding three musicians (playing the harp, portative organ and lute): miniature from Pierre Nesson's 'Vigillus de la mort, ou Paraphrase des neufs leçons de Job', mid-15th century (F-Pn fr.1226, f.40r)

English Story of Holy Job by a disciple of John Lydgate, and the French La patience de Job. These plays, rich in musical elements, were inspired by the legendary tradition initiated by the so-called Testament in Job. This is a fanciful 1st-century commentary on the book of Job originating among the Jewish sect of the Essenes; suppressed by both the Christian West and Orthodox Judaism it eventually made its way to Renaissance Europe, probably by way of Islam.

Job's position as patron of music was comparatively short-lived, gradually waning during the course of the 16th century. Perhaps the cause for this was the continued strong presence of the orthodox Christian tradition of Job that has maintained a hold on the Western imagination well into modern times. Symptomatic of this is Rubens's painting of 1612: though presented to the musicians' guild of Antwerp, it pictures him in the ancient manner, seated naked upon a dunghill surrounded by his three scolding friends.

Jobert. French firm of music publishers. In 1922 Jean Jobert (b Lyons, 11 Oct 1883; d Paris, 27 Nov 1957) acquired the Parisian company of Eugène Fromont, for which he had worked; it had published most of Debussy's important works, including Nocturnes, Suite bergamasque, Le roi Lear, Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune and several song collections. Denise Jobert-Georges, the daughter of Jean Jobert, became manager of the firm in 1957 and in 1995 bought Editions Musicales du Marais. This published the Patrimoine series and had itself previously acquired Costallat. In addition to 19th- and early 20th-century French music, Jobert publishes contemporary scores including those by Ohana, Dufourt and Dalbavie.

ALAN POPE

Jobim, Antônio Carlos [Tom] (Brasileiro de Almeida) (b Rio de Janeiro, 25 Jan 1927; d New York, 8 Dec 1994). Brazilian composer, pianist, guitarist and arranger. In his early teens he took piano lessons from Koellreutter and later from Branco and Tomás Terán, and also studied orchestration, harmony and composition. In the mid-1940s he began to work as a pianist in the bars and nightclubs of Rio's beach areas of Copacabana and Ipanema. In 1952 he worked as an arranger for the recording firm Continental and his first recorded pieces appeared in the following year. He became the artistic director for the Odeon label in 1956 and began a lifelong association with the poet Vinicius de Morais, composing and conducting the music for the play Orfeu da Conceição.

In 1959 the aesthetic manifesto of the bossa nova was famously presented on João Gilberto's album Chega de Saudade, which included Jobim's song Desafinado, with lyrics by Newton Mendonça, and Jobim's Samba de uma nota só was included on Gilberto's second album, O amor, o sorriso e a flor (1960). Among the many Vincius-Jobim collaborations, however, none won more international popularity than Garota de Ipanema (1962). With Stan Getz and Charlie Byrd's instrumental version of Desafinado, the American bossa nova craze took hold: Audio Fidelity promoted a concert of bossa nova music at Carnegie Hall in November 1962, and in 1963 The Composer of Desafinado Plays was issued, Jobim's first solo recording. From 1964 onwards his success in the USA grew rapidly, with various Grammy awards, several LP releases including Francis Albert Sinatra and Antonio Carlos Jobim (1967), and television and film soundtrack contracts. By the late 1960s his music had become part of the repertory of leading international pop and jazz artists.

During the last 25 years of his life the worldwide recognition of his talents was unprecedented for a Brazilian popular musician: his music was recorded in the best studios of New York and Los Angeles and released on the largest multinational labels. He toured with his Banda Nova in several continents, received further Grammy awards and was awarded many honours, including honorary doctorates from Brazilian and Portuguese universities. Most important were his collaborations with other Brazilian musicians, including João Gilberto, Chico Buarque, Edu Lobo, Caetano Veloso and Milton Nascimento. Several biographies, songbooks and monographs on his work were published. His output, which numbers some 250 titles, reveals his talents as a profoundly creative composer whose innovative and inspiring melodies, harmonies and rhythms and inventive orchestration always expressed his passionate love for his native city and its people with simplicity and honest emotion.

GERARD BÉHAGUE

Jobin, Bernhard [Bernard, Bernhart] (b Porrentruy; d Strasbourg, *c*1594). German printer. He became a citizen of Strasbourg on 27 April 1560. He learnt the printing trade while working as an engraver in a local shop; a special dispensation from the city magistrate allowed him to pay an extra fee for professional status in both capacities. On 10 June 1567, he married Anna Fischart, sister of the prolific writer Johann Fischart. Jobin's first publications in 1570 included poems by Fischart; he became the exclusive publisher for his brother-in-law's works. Because of their attacks on the church and other institutions, some of these appeared under pseudonyms and with fictitious places of publication. Jobin also published scientific works. His sons, particularly Tobias, continued to publish for a few years after their father's death. In 1605 Tobias also died and the enterprise was sold.

Editions of musical works occupy an important place in Jobin's total output. Among the numerous books of hymns and psalms are several collections of Martin Luther's works, and Marot and Bèze's psalms with melodies by Goudimel. The instrumental tablatures, which he published during the 1570s and 80s, are of particular interest: these are for lute, cittern and keyboard. The two books for lute in German tablature by Jobin himself are notable for their clarity of presentation and the variety of their contents. The first book, dated 1572, includes a long prefatory poem by Fischart in praise of the lute. It contains four fantasias, a fine choice of vocal intabulations of works by Arcadelt, Crecquillon, Ferrabosco, Lassus, Scandello, Verdelot, Willaert and Zirler, and three passamezzos with saltarellos. The second book has five more passamezzos and saltarellos, seven galliards, six branles and 15 pairs of Dantz and Nachdäntze. These publications are intended more for the student than the accomplished performer. However, later editors such as Kargel and Waissel were influenced by his great variety in embellishment technique and the formal sophistication of his works.

Jobin, Raoul (b Quebec, 8 April 1906; d Quebec, 13 Jan 1974). Canadian tenor. He studied first in Quebec, then in Paris. There Busser engaged him for the Opéra, where he made his début as Gounod's Tybalt in 1930 and sang minor roles for two years. After two seasons in Bordeaux, he returned to the Opéra in 1935; there he sang Romeo, Faust, Raoul and Lohengrin, and created Fabrice in Sauguet's Chartreuse de Parme (1939). At the Opéra-Comique he sang Don José, Julien, Werther, Hoffmann, Massenet's Des Grieux and Cavaradossi. He left France in 1939 and made his Metropolitan début in 1940 as Des Grieux, later singing Tonio (La fille du régiment), Faust, Don José, Romeo, Pelléas and Canio. He also sang Gérald (Lakmé) in San Francisco (1940) and Don José in Chicago (1941). He returned to the Opéra, where his roles (1949–52) included Mârouf, Walther, Radames and Boito's Faust. On retirement he opened a singing school in Montreal. His firm, bright-toned voice and enthusiastic style can be heard to advantage in a number of recordings, notably as Don José, Romeo, Hoffmann and Tonio, and as Admetus (opposite Flagstad) in Gluck's Alceste.

Jocelin, Simeon (b Branford, CT, 22 Oct 1746; d New Haven, CT, 5 June 1823). American composer. See PSALMODY (ii), §II, 2.

Jocelin de Dijon (fl 1200–25). French trouvère. Two of his songs survive. A l'entree del dous comencement, R.647, was probably written about 1220 since it refers to the absence of Andriu and the Seigneur d'Arsie, identifiable with André III de Montbard and Jehan I, Seigneur d'Arcis-sur-Aube. These men took part in the crusade of 1218, and the latter did not return. Whereas its strophes are divided into groups of four and five lines, the musical setting in the Noailles manuscript (F-Pn fr.12615), which employs the highly unusual pattern ABB^1B^2ACDEF, subdivides into groups of five and four. It later served as a model for the anonymous Vers Dieu mes fais desirrans sui forment, R.677. His other work is Par une matinee en mai, R.95. Two additional works which survive without music are credited to a Jocelin in the Berne manuscript (CH-BEsu 389) and may be by Jocelin de Dijon. (All the texts are ed. E. Nissen, Les chansons attribuées à Guiot de Dijon et Jocelin, Paris, 1928; works with melodies ed. in CMM, cvii, 1997)

THEODORE KARP

Jochum. German family of musicians.

(1) Otto Jochum (b Babenhausen, 18 March 1898; d Bad Reichenhall, 24 Oct 1969). Choirmaster and composer. He studied the organ, the piano and theory with his father, Ludwig Jochum. He entered the Augsburg Conservatory and then the Munich Akademie der Tonkunst, where he studied conducting, the piano and composition, the last with Joseph Haas. From 1922 he taught at a singing school in Augsburg and in 1933 followed his singing teacher Albert Greiner as director of the municipal singing school. In 1932 his oratorio Der jüngste Tag op.28 won a national first prize; he was also commissioned by the International Society for Catholic Music to compose an opera on the theme of Jacob and his fight with the angels. The work was scheduled to be performed in 1933 in Aachen, Cologne and Rome, but the Nazis outlawed the project since material based on the Old Testament was no longer deemed ideologically acceptable. Jochum recovered from this setback, composing patriotic works such as the cantata An das Vaterland (1933) and the hymn Unser Lied: Deutschland (1938). He also received the title of professor in 1935, was appointed director of the Augsburg Music Conservatory in 1938 and in 1939 held seminars in choral music and began to direct a chorus bearing his name, continuing until his retirement in 1951. At this time he was ostracized by the Rosenberg wing of the Nazi party for his continued commitment to writing Catholic sacred music. In 1951 ill-health forced him to retire, but he continued to compose in his later years. Choral works constitute the greatest part of his output; he wrote many works for combinations of up to seven choruses, and some of his simple patriotic choruses were very popular in the early 1930s. Many of his other choral works are arrangements of folksongs, which are also found in other compositions, such as the Florianer Sinfonie op.84.

(2) Eugen Jochum (b Babenhausen, Bavaria, 1 Nov 1902; d Munich, 26 March 1987). Conductor, brother of (1) Otto Jochum. He showed musical aptitude from early childhood and played the organ at church services from the age of eight. After attending the Musikschule, Augsburg, until 1922 he went to the Akademie der Tonkunst, Munich, chiefly as a composition student of Waltershausen, but later he studied conducting with von Hausegger and worked as répétiteur at the Nationaltheater, Munich and at Mönchen-Gladbach. His successful concert début as a conductor at Munich (1926) led to his appointment to the Kiel Opera, where he was soon made first conductor. He remained there until 1929, acquiring a repertory of more than 50 operas and also conducting concerts at Lübeck. He moved to Mannheim for a season (1929–30), and to Duisburg as Generalmusikdirektor (1930–32). A performance of Bruckner's Fifth Symphony led to his appointment as musical director for Berlin radio before his 30th birthday in 1932, and to a guest association with the Berlin PO which continued throughout his career. In 1934 he succeeded Muck and Böhm as Generalmusikdirektor at the Hamburg Staatsoper and principal conductor of the Hamburg PO. He remained there until 1949, avoiding much of the political pressure of the Nazi regime and continuing to perform the works of Bartók, Hindemith and Stravinsky at a time when they were banned elsewhere in Germany. Jochum was also engaged to conduct the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra in the occupied Netherlands, which brought about a continuing association in the postwar years. He returned to Munich in 1949 as musical director for Bavarian radio, and formed the Bavarian RSO which he trained to international standard and with which he appeared at the 1957 Edinburgh Festival. With the orchestra he gave several premières, including Karl Amadeus Hartmann's Symphony no.6 (1953). During the 1950s he widened his reputation as a guest conductor; he first appeared at Bayreuth in 1953, conducting Tristan und Isolde. He shared with Haitink the conductorship of the Concertgebouw Orchestra, 1961–4, and (having turned down an invitation to conduct 15 concerts with the New York PO in the 1930s, believing he had insufficient experience) made his American début with the Dutch orchestra in 1961. From 1969 to 1973 he was principal conductor of the Bamberg SO and from 1975 conductor laureate of the LSO.

Jochum's approach to performance was an act of dedication, drawing from his players a warm, luminous response to the inner vision he sought to communicate. It gave him a pre-eminent reputation as a Bruckner conductor; he favoured the Nowak edition of the symphonies and wrote articles on Bruckner interpretation in music journals and programme books. His notably spacious, romantic approach to Bruckner, with liberal tempo variations within movements, was tempered by a keen feeling for underlying pulse. His recordings include two outstanding sets of Bruckner's symphonies, three sets each of the Brahms and Beethoven symphonies, Bach's major choral works, the late Mozart symphonies and the 12 London symphonies of Haydn. His Bach recordings, while taking relatively little account of authentic performing practice, are marked by their intense spiritual conviction; and his refined, athletic readings of Haydn and Mozart are among the most distinguished of their time. Jochum's strengths as an opera conductor can be heard in his recordings of Die Entführung aus dem Serail, Così fan tutte, Der Freischütz and, especially, Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg (with Fischer-Dieskau and Domingo). He was awarded the Brahms Medal of the City of Hamburg, and the Bruckner Medal of the International Bruckner Society, of whose German section he was president from 1950 until his death.

(3) Georg Ludwig Jochum (b Babenhausen, Bavaria, 10 Dec 1909; d Mülheim an der Ruhr, 1 Nov 1970). Conductor, brother of (1) Otto Jochum. Like his older brothers he went to the Musikschule, Augsburg, and the Akademie der Tonkunst, Munich, where he studied composition with Haas and conducting with von Hausegger until 1932. He was music director for the city of Münster (1932–4) and first conductor at the Frankfurt Opera and director of the city concerts (1934–7); he held a similar position at Plauen (until 1940), and was appointed Generalmusikdirektor at Linz (1940–45). During this time he also conducted the Bruckner Orchestra of the German radio and the Bruckner festivals at St Florian from 1943. In 1946 he became Generalmusikdirektor at Duisburg and director of the conservatory there, and did much to rebuild the city's postwar musical life. He also had an association for some years with the Bamberg SO and the RIAS SO, Berlin; he toured as a guest conductor in other European countries and in South America, sharing his brother (2) Eugen Jochum's devotion to Bruckner's music in particular.

Jodál, Gábor (b Odorheiu Secuiesc, 12/25 April 1913; d Cluj-Napoca, 6 Dec 1989). Romanian composer of Hungarian descent. After taking the doctorate in law at Cluj University (1930–37) he studied composition with Kodály at the Budapest Academy and pursued piano studies (1939–42). Jodál's career included appointments in Cluj as assistant music master at the Hungarian Theatre (1942–4), as lecturer at the Hungarian Arts Institute (1947–50) and as lecturer (1950) then pro-rector (1965–73) at the Academy. A composer of traditional stylistic orientation, he was highly self-critical and left few works. The refinement of his writing complements the subtlety of his harmonic and melodic language.

Jöde, (Wilhelm August Ferdinand) Fritz (b Hamburg, 2 Aug 1887; d Hamburg, 19 Oct 1970). German music educationist. After attending teachers' training college (1902–8) and working as a teacher in Hamburg, he studied musicology at the Musikhochschule in Leipzig (1920–21) and was appointed professor at the Berlin Akademie für Kirchen- und Schulmusik in 1923. Jöde simultaneously contributed significantly to the Jugendmusikbewegung by founding amateur music societies called Musikantengilde, which aimed to create a sense of community through music, and editing the journals Die Laute and Die Musikantengilde. Also in 1923 he was named director of the music school that was affiliated with the academy; his influential book Das schaffende Kind der Musik was published in 1928 and he served as head of the Volks- und Jugendmusikpflege programme at the academy from 1930. In 1936 he was found guilty of making sexual overtures to several female students and dismissed; these charges, although justified, were most likely made public because Nazi officials suspected Jöde of being a socialist. Temporarily ostracized, he worked intermittently as a broadcaster in Munich, but after applying for Nazi party membership in 1938, he was made professor at the Mozarteum in Salzburg, joining Cesar Bresgen in the Hitler Youth music division. Jöde moved to a Nazi educational institute in Brunswick in 1943 and Bad Reichenhall in 1944. After the war he was director of the Amt für Jugend- und Musikpflege in Hamburg (1947–52) and from 1952 he served as chairman of the Internationales Institut für Jugend- und Volksmusik, for which he conducted courses in Trossingen and Stuttgart. He was an editor for the series Das Chorbuch and prepared several volumes of song collections (including Der kleine Rosengarten, Jena 1921; Der Kanon, Wolfenbüttel, 1937; Sonnenberg-Liederbuch, with W. Gundlach, Wolfenbüttel, 1957).

Jöde's history as a music educator in Germany is controversial: his apologists argue that the naivety of his educational methods, which eschewed analysis and political awareness, allowed many features of the Jugendmusikbewegung – the fostering of a communal music culture (Gemeinschaftsmusikkultur), the rejection of 'bourgeois' ideals such as virtuoso music-making, the mystical cult of the 'Volk' – to play into the hands of the Hitler Youth. Critics point out that Jöde was an active supporter of Nazi ideology, repackaging his ideas in 1934 to match the wishes of the party and seeking support from prominent Nazis such as the philosopher and educationist Ernst Krieck, the publisher Georg Kallmeyer and the amateur writer on music Richard Eichenauer. His student, Wolfgang Stumme, was head of the music division of the Hitler Youth and invited Jöde to contribute a chapter to the 1940 edition of its music handbook Musik im Volk. During his postwar career, Jöde was accepted as an important figure in the reform of German music education, gaining the title 'father of folk music', and he was much praised for his revival of folklore and folkdances and his work as editor and author.

Joel, Billy [William] (Martin) (b Bronx, NY, 9 May 1949). American rock singer, songwriter and pianist. In the early 1950s he moved with his family to Hicksville, New York, where he studied the piano. Between 1964 and 1971 he performed in several unsuccessful bands, turning to a solo career in 1971. His first album, Cold Spring Harbor (Family, 1972), failed to sell and he moved briefly to Los Angeles, where he performed as a lounge pianist. In 1973 he signed to Columbia Records and recorded the album Piano Man (Col., 1974). It sold moderately well, but his reputation was spread primarily by concert performances. Success finally came in 1977 with the single 'Just the Way You Are', a romantic ballad taken from the album The Stranger (Col., 1977). The album ultimately sold over 9 million copies while the single won two Grammy Awards. Joel continued to write and record songs that would become rock standards throughout the late 1970s and early 1980s, among them My Life, You may be right and It's still rock and roll to me. He won another Grammy for his first number one album, 52nd Street (Col., 1978). An Innocent Man (Col., 1983) was a tribute to early rock and roll styles and three of its songs, 'Tell her about it', 'Uptown Girl' and 'An Innocent Man', became top ten hits. In 1987 he was one of the first major American rock stars to perform in the Soviet Union. He maintained his popular appeal into the late 1980s and 90s, when the albums Storm Front (Col., 1989) and River Of Dreams (Col., 1993) both reached number one in the USA.

Despite widespread popularity Joel never veered too far from his roots. Influenced by early rock and roll and rhythm and blues artists, including groups such as the Beatles, the Drifters and the Four Seasons, and eschewing overkill, he favoured tightly structured pop melodies and down-to-earth, unpretentious songwriting. The songs 'Allentown' and 'Goodnight Saigon' (from Nylon Curtain, Col., 1982) both spoke of politically controversial matters. Although his piano playing often exhibited showy flourishes, he kept arrangements and record production simple, reined in his vocals and backing musicians to avoid bombast, and was careful to craft each song and album so that it maintained its own identity.

JEFF TAMARKIN

Joffe [Yofe], Shlomo [Shlomi] (b Warsaw, 19 May 1909; d Beit-Alpha, 29 Dec 1995). Israeli composer and teacher of Polish origin. In his youth he studied the piano, theory and solfège in Kuybïshev, Russia (1918–21), and in 1924 in Warsaw joined the Zionist movement Hashomer Hatzair, playing the mandoline, tuba, baritone and clarinet in its folk orchestras. He graduated from the Teachers' Seminarium in Poznań in 1928, and in 1930, following agricultural studies in Brno, Czechoslovakia, moved to Palestine, helping to establish a kibbutz in 1932. Only after 1940 did he begin to be involved with music again, at first teaching and arranging music at the kibbutz Beit-Alpha. After a period of concentrated study (1947–53), with Tal and Partos at the New Jerusalem Academy of Music, and privately with Boskovich, he devoted himself to composition and teaching at the district conservatory for kibbutzim at Beth-She'an Valley, where he was director until 1973. In the 1950s, under Boskovich's influence, he used elements of Middle Eastern Jewish song, maqām, heterophony and a form of chromatic modality, often in the expression of biblical and Israeli dramas, for example, in the cantata Aliot ha'Gilboa ('Tales of Mt Gilboa', 1953), but also in his Prokofiev-like neo-classical symphonic works. These features remained evident in later works, despite the influence of Schoenberg in the compositions of the 1960s and the influences that followed a visit to Darmstadt in 1962 and meetings with Lutosławski and Penderecki. His cantata Rising Night after Night (1978), for example, exhibits many contemporary aspects, including extended vocal techniques, clusters and a deformed folk melody, but despite these developments, Joffe always remained, through his teaching, association and biblical roots, a 'kibbutz composer'.

NATHAN MISHORI

Johan Robert. French or Spanish singer, possibly identifiable with the composers TREBOR and BORLET.

Johann, Hans. See TRNEČEK, HANUŠ.

Johann Ernst, Prince of Weimar (b Weimar, 1696; d Frankfurt, 1 Aug 1715). German composer and violinist. This gifted, short-lived prince was the second son of Johann Ernst IX of the Ernestine branch of the Saxon house of Wettin. He was highly regarded by his contemporaries, J.S. Bach, Telemann, Walther, Mattheson and Bellermann.

As a child, he was taught the violin by G.C. Eilenstein, court musician, and, after 1707, the keyboard by J.G. Walther, Weimar town organist. Walther's birthday gift to the young prince in 1708 was a manuscript treatise, Praecepta der musikalischen Composition (ed. P. Benary, Leipzig, 1955). He was in direct contact with J.S. Bach, Weimar court organist from 1708 to 1717. He was sent to study at the University of Utrecht, returning in spring 1713; thereafter he studied composition with Walther for nine months.

Of his 19 instrumental works cited by Walther, six violin concertos survive as op.1, Six Concerts à un Violon concertant, deux Violons, une Taille, et Clavecin ou Basse de Viole. They were engraved on copper plates and published posthumously by Telemann in 1718 (according to Telemann's preface, the prince was engraving the plates before his death). Four of the concertos are in three movements, two in four; four are in minor keys, two in major. Italian violinistic figures are common. Vivaldi's influence is quite possible: the prince could have returned from Holland with Vivaldi's op.3 concertos published in Amsterdam in 1712. Four compositions by Johann Ernst provide the basis for six keyboard concerto arrangements by J.S. Bach: unknown works were used for BWV592 and 595, for organ (or 592a and 984 for harpsichord), and op.1 nos.1 and 4 became BWV982 and 987, for harpsichord. Telemann dedicated his first published music, Six Sonates à violon seul (Frankfurt, 1715), to the prince.

KURT VON FISCHER

Johannesburg. Largest city in the Republic of South Africa and principal city in Gauteng province. It started as a mining camp in 1886, with the discovery of gold on the Rand, and by the end of 1887 Luscombe Searelle had established a professional opera company there; the Rand was soon included in the itineraries of touring companies. Local amateurs also provided musical presentations in the early years.

Percival Kirby (1887–1970), Scottish-born composer and instrumentalist, was head of the Witwatersrand University music department (1923–52). He was responsible for numerous performances of little-known operas, directed the university orchestra and pioneered the study and collection of African music and instruments.

In 1926 John Connell, then city organist, started an annual 'Music Fortnight', which offered orchestral and operatic performances using local musicians recruited for the occasion; there were also occasional visits by the Durban and Cape Town city orchestras. A professional orchestra was clearly needed: the Johannesburg City Council founded its orchestra (about 37 members), which combined with the regional radio orchestra of the South African Broadcasting Corporation (SABC) to give its inaugural season in 1946 under Sir Malcolm Sargent. A highlight in Johannesburg's musical life occurred in 1948, when Sir Thomas Beecham (on a visit that included Cape Town and Durban) conducted the combined forces of the Johannesburg City Orchestra and the three regional studio orchestras of the SABC.

After a period of guest conductors, Frits Schuurman and Gideon Fagan were appointed permanent conductors in 1949, but the City Orchestra was destined to be short-lived. When broadcasting was centralized in Johannesburg in 1954, the SABC, by agreement with the City Council, formed its own symphony orchestra from the members of its own studio orchestra, the City Orchestra and the small orchestras previously maintained by its regional studios. It had about 80 players and was the first South African orchestra of true symphonic dimension and was the focus of Johannesburg's musical activity for many years after its inception. It became the National SO of the SABC (NSO) in 1971. Eminent guest conductors included Boulez and Stravinsky; the permanent conductors were Jeremy Schulman, Anton Hartman (head of music of the SABC, 1960–77), Edgar Cree and Francesco Mander. The NSO toured provincially, gave school performances and accompanied opera seasons before the Performing Arts Council of the Transvaal founded an orchestra in Pretoria (1965). By agreement with the city council, it always gave numerous public concerts, which were also broadcast.

The programmes of the NSO showed considerable enterprise: the traditional repertory was frequently supplemented with modern works given their first South African performance, for example Penderecki's Threnody for the Victims of Hiroshima. Besides premières of South African works, it gave the world première of Badings's Variations on a South African Theme in 1961. International artists were presented, often in collaboration with the principal societies, the Johannesburg Musical Society (founded 1902) and Musica Viva. The orchestra was privatized in 1998 after the SABC had stopped funding its activities. Although still called the NSO, it is now principally an orchestra of the city of Johannesburg.

Besides its primary role in fostering South African music, the SABC maintained a large choir and a junior orchestra, whose members took part in the International Festival of Youth Orchestras in Lausanne (1972). It also participated in international competitions, exchanged transcription recordings with several countries, and broadcast symphony concerts and recitals, illustrated talks and church music. In recent years, the SABC has scaled down its broadcasts of live music, especially of Western music.

The Performing Arts Council of the Transvaal (PACT) contributed a great deal and was responsible for most opera productions there. Based in Pretoria, its orchestra started with about 60 members and made frequent provincial tours. All of its productions are now in the State Theatre in Pretoria. With the gradual phasing out of the provincial arts councils by central government, the PACT opera company and orchestra have also been privatized.

The South African Society of Music Teachers developed from a small association of teachers formed on the Rand in 1919. It has become a national society; in 1931 it began publishing the biannual South African Music Teacher.

The principal halls in Johannesburg are the City Hall, the Civic Theatre and the university's Great Hall.

CAROLINE MEARS/JAMES MAY

Johannes Cotto [Johannes Affligemensis] (*fl c*1100). Music theorist. Active around St Gallen or in southern Germany, he wrote one of the most copied and cited of all medieval treatises.

1. Problems of identification. 2. The treatise.

1. Problems of identification. The identity of this theorist has been the subject of much speculation and confusion. A monk, who identified himself simply as Johannes, dedicated a music treatise (*c*1100) to a Bishop or Abbot Fulgentius. The dedicatee is described in most sources as 'episcopum Anglorum' ('bishop of the English'), but the modern editor of the treatise, Smits van Waesberghe, read one version of the dedication as addressed to a 'venerabili Angelorum antistiti Fulgentio' ('Fulgentius, venerable abbot of the angels'). This was on the basis of a faint abbreviation sign, which occurs in only one of around 20 existing copies, the 12th-century manuscript I-Rvat Regina 1196. Smits van Waesberghe proposed that the treatise was addressed to the Fulgentius who was abbot (1089–1121) of the monastery in Affligem, Flanders, in which the monks were sometimes referred to as 'angels', and that Johannes was one of them. Hence the ascription of the treatise to 'Johannes of Afflighem' or 'Johannes Affligemensis'.

Another candidate for authorship was suggested by Gerbert (GerbertS, ii, 230), who knew of two manuscripts (in Paris and Antwerp, neither extant) that attributed the work to Johannes Cotton or Cottonius. This information, combined with the phrase 'episcopum Anglorum', led to the speculation that John Cotton was an English monk, but no Bishop Fulgentius could be traced in England.

Although biographical evidence is scant, it is possible to locate Johannes geographically through evidence in the treatise itself. On the basis of the chants cited, Huglo assigned the tonary that follows the treatise to the 'east zone' of his map of tonaries, the region of present-day Switzerland. Johannes showed a knowledge of notational practices peculiar to this region: the interval notation of Hermannus Contractus (chap.21), the tonal letters used only around St Gallen (chap.11), and the Romanic letters (litterae significativae) found only in manuscripts in southern Germany and Metz (chap.21). He also displayed a knowledge of Berno of Reichenau's treatise, which was little known outside Germanic lands. He mentioned the letters used only in the St Gallen area to designate the eight modes: a, e, i, o, u, H, y and ω (chap.11). His use of the Greek tribal names, such as Dorian and Phrygian, for the modes is also a German trait. The provenance of the earliest manuscripts (dating from the 12th century), apart from one from Canterbury, points to the same region: Basle University, the Michaelsberg Abbey, Bamberg, the Cistercian monasteries at Pforta and at Rein (Styria). The chants and the manuscripts seem to locate Johannes either in southern Germany or north-east Switzerland. It is just possible that the author, perhaps even an Englishman named John Cotton, studied in his youth with an English Fulgentius, who later became abbot at Afflighem, that he settled in a monastery near St Gallen, and at Abbot Fulgentius's urging wrote the treatise there.

2. The treatise. Johannes's De musica (a convenient title supported by only one late copy) consists of 27 chapters, the last four of which comprise a tonary found in only five of the sources. The treatise is essentially a reworking and expansion of Guido's Micrologus (*c*1026). The sequence of topics follows Guido's: the study of music in general; the gamut and monochord division; the affinities; errors in chant and their emendation; the modes, their finals and ambitus; melodic composition; and organum. Johannes placed Guido's chapter 20, on Pythagoras's discovery of the ratios of the consonances, earlier (as chap.3). Johannes also inserted chapters on musical timbre of voices and instruments, on Greek notation, on the litterae significativae and other notational innovations, and on the differentiae, a topic that relates to his tonary (chaps.24–7). Johannes expanded Guido's treatment of the division of the monochord, defects in chant transmission and how to correct them, the ethical effects of music, and composition of melody. Of greater significance, however, is his description of a more modern practice of organum. The treatise may be dated to around 1100 on the basis of its contents and the sources.

Through the treatise Johannes aimed to teach boys how to sing chant correctly and to give them a general education in music. He avoided theoretical complications, but his book displays a reading of both classical and medieval authors, citing Plato, Virgil, Horace, Donatus, Prudentius, Amalarius, Priscian, Isidore of Seville, Martianus Capella and Boethius.

Johannes is the most illuminating of the medieval writers on the modes; he discussed how to recognize them in chant, how to apply them in composition, and their emotional and ethical effects. Not only did he distinguish them by their finals and range but also by their tenors: the tenor of the second mode is f; of the first, fourth and sixth, a; of the third, fifth and eighth, c′; and of the seventh, d′. He referred to this note also as the saeculorum, that is the note sung on that word in the lesser doxology of a psalm. He also defined the location of the beginning of the 'Gloria Patri' for each of the tones as c for the second psalm tone, e for the fourth, f for the first, fifth and sixth, g for the third and eighth and c′ for the seventh. Johannes emphasized that in composing melodies it is necessary to return frequently to the final, particularly at a distinctio or pause that is marked in the text by punctuation and in the melody by the end of a phrase.

On the matter of chant transposition, Johannes was conservative. He preferred to have a chant end on a cofinal than see B♭ or other accidentals introduced. But he was forward-looking in adopting Guido's colouring of the staff-lines (red for the F line and yellow for the C line) or identifying them by letters or other means.

Johannes was critical of the litterae significativae, letters placed above neumes, described in a letter by Notker Balbulus and used in a small number of manuscripts (e.g. CH-E 121), such as 'c' for cito (swiftly), 'l' for leniter (gently) or 's' for suaviter (smoothly). He complained that the letters were ambiguous, for 'c' could also mean caute (carefully), 'l' leva (lift up) and 's' sursum (on high).

Johannes's chapter on diaphony or organum (chap.23) has attracted the most attention of modern scholars. He prefaced the treatment of organum with a disquisition on melodic motion, in which he paraphrased portions of chapter 16 of Guido's Micrologus. He described melody as consisting of upward and downward movements, combined into figures of smaller or greater intervals, which are juxtaposed with other figures of higher or lower pitch. These motions are important for organum, because the organal part should move in a contrary direction to the chant. The two parts should close phrases in a unison or octave, the unison being preferred. The organal part could sometimes have two or three notes per syllable of the chant. These instructions are consistent with surviving 12th-century examples of polyphony.

CLAUDE V. PALISCA

Johannes Cuvellarius. Trouvère who may be identifiable with JEHAN LE CUVELIER D'ARRAS.

Johannes de Bosco [Boscho, Bosquo]. Name shared by two or three different people active in France in the late 14th century.

(1) Johannes de Bosco [Boscho, Bosquo; Jean du Bois] (d before 30 Nov 1406). French singer, probably identifiable with the composer Bosquet.

(2) Johannes de Bosco (fl 1398). Catalan cleric, almost certainly not identifiable with Bosquet.

(3) Johannes de Bosco alias Peliçon [Peliso, Pelison, Pellisson, Pellissonus] (fl 1399). French composer, not identifiable with (1) Johannes de Bosco.

For further discussion see BOSQUET.

Johannes de Burgundia (fl mid- to late 13th century). Theorist. HIERONYMUS DE MORAVIA ascribed to him the third of four treatises on discant that he compiled to form his chapter on measured polyphony. Hieronymus observed, however, that 'according to the common opinion' this treatise is by Franco of Cologne (it is his Ars cantus mensurabilis). The following treatise in Hieronymus's compilation, a compendium ascribed to Petrus de Picardia, claims to be based on both the ars (method) of Franco and the arbor (tree) of Magister Johannes de Burgundia. This arbor does not survive; it may have been a diagram or chart demonstrating the Franconian doctrine. This may be the same person as the 'Magister de Burgundia' referred to by the theorist Anonymus 4 (ed. Reckow, 1967, i, 50) as a scribe involved in the later transmission of the Magnus liber and related collections of mensural polyphony, probably active in Paris between the time of Robertus de Sabilone and that of Franco.

IAN D. BENT/EDWARD H. ROESNER

Johannes de Erfordia (b ?Erfurt; *fl c*1465–75). ?German composer. He was probably born in Erfurt, although Herford has also been suggested. His five surviving compositions were all copied by Johannes Bonadies into the 15th-century Faenza Codex (I-FZc 117), in 1473–4, from which they were recopied by Padre Martini (in I-Bc A32). The motet Ave regina caelorum, mater regis seems to be incomplete: the two lowest surviving voices are a 4th apart at cadences, and a bassus may thus be missing. The Kyrie and Sanctus are probably from a cyclic mass, because both use the same initial point of imitation and the same pitches at major cadence points. Two compositions have Italian texts: Doloroso mi tapinello (ed. K. Jeppesen, La frottola, ii, Copenhagen, 1969, p.303) and Non so se l'è la mia culpa. Both are very simple syllabic settings, the bass voices of which have a primarily harmonic function and frequently move by leaps of a 4th or 5th.

Johannes de Garlandia [Johannes Gallicus] (fl *c*1270–1320). French theorist. His name has been associated since the end of the 13th century with two important treatises, one of which was the starting-point for nearly all treatments of mensural notation in the second half of the 13th century; but it now appears that the authorship of the original treatises was anonymous and that Johannes de Garlandia merely revised and updated one or both of them.

1. Identification. 2. De plana musica. 3. De mensurabili musica: (i) Rhythm (ii) Polyphony (iii) Revision. 4. Historical position.

1. IDENTIFICATION. To judge from the way his name was cited in later sources, Johannes de Garlandia was apparently a magister in the University of Paris, whose surname was derived from the clos de Garlande, an area of the Left Bank where many masters and students lived. Hieronymus de Moravia, the late 13th-century compiler who transmitted the revised version of the treatise on mensural music, also called him Johannes Gallicus, indicating that he was French. Although several scholars (notably Waite) have sought to identify him with the English poet and grammarian Johannes de Garlandia (*c*1190–*c*1272), who taught in Paris in the second quarter of the 13th century, almost all recent scholarship (beginning with Reimer and Rasch) has rejected this idea. It now seems probable that the theorist was not active before the 1270s, as postulated by Huglo (1986) and others.

Although the earliest source of De plana musica and De mensurabili musica is a Parisian manuscript copied about 1260 (I-Rvat lat.5325), no author is named in this or any other source of the original versions of the treatises, and the earliest citations of De mensurabili musica, by Anonymus 4 (CoussemakerS, i) and the Sowa or St Emmeram anonymus, are also nameless. The name of Johannes de Garlandia is first associated with the treatises towards the end of the 13th century by Hieronymus de Moravia, who incorporated into his own compilation a revised version of De mensurabili musica; in consequence Pinegar has suggested very persuasively that Johannes de Garlandia was not the original author or compiler of either treatise but rather the person who revised the text for Hieronymus. Whitcomb has made a circumstantial case for identifying him with Jehan de Garlandia, a bookseller (librarius) on the rue des Parchemeniers, who appears in Parisian tax records and other documents between 1296 and 1319. Johannes de Garlandia himself (as distinct from the anonymous author of the original treatises) would thus have been contemporaneous with the other writers or compilers of substantial treatises on mensural music in the latter decades of the 13th century – Lambertus, Anonymus 4, the St Emmeram anonymus, Franco of Cologne and Hieronymus de Moravia – as had long been suspected by Reckow.

2. 'DE PLANA MUSICA'. The original version of De mensurabili musica begins 'Habito de ipsa plana musica . . .' (Having treated of plainchant . . .), and in the earliest manuscript (I-Rvat lat.5325, *c*1260) the mensural treatise is immediately preceded by a version of an anonymous treatise on plainchant that was later attributed to Johannes de Garlandia and has been given the modern title De plana musica. Meyer has argued that the discrepant texts that survive represent a coherent doctrine, but one that originated as an oral teaching rather than a written treatise. He has edited four manuscript versions from the 13th to the 15th centuries as different reportationes, or written accounts by others, of the same doctrine; none refers to Johannes de Garlandia.

The earliest reportatio is that of Rvat lat.5325. A more complete reportatio, in the late 13th-century F-Pn lat.18514, directly follows a glossed copy of Boethius's De institutione musica. The third reportatio is found in the 14th-century I-Rvat Reg.lat.1146, while the fourth, of 15th-century Italian origin (Rvat Barb.lat.307), survives as prefatory material to the Ars nova attributed to Philippe de Vitry (cf Plantinga; Reaney, Gilles and Maillard). But the earliest attribution of this teaching to Johannes de Garlandia is indirect, coming from mentions by Hieronymus de Moravia (Tractatus de musica, chap.1), Johannes de Grocheio and Guy de Saint-Denis (Tractatus de tonis, *c*1315; cf Reimer, 1972, i, 6–9). Later in the 14th century, there was no hesitation in crediting this material to Johannes de Garlandia, to judge from the compendium entitled Introductio musicae planae secundum magistrum Johannem de Garlandia. It is not impossible that this compilation is indeed Johannes de Garlandia's work, made on the basis of the De plana musica tradition (see §3(iii) below for the revision of De mensurabili musica).

The various reportationes of De plana musica vary in completeness and order of topics, but the most logically presented (F-Pn lat.18514) begins with general statements about the classification of music, including its position within the scheme of knowledge, its definitions and division into musica mundana, musica humana and musica instrumentalis, and the diatonic, chromatic and enharmonic genera of melody. Next comes an explanation of numerical proportion in the abstract, which is then applied to the musical intervals and the division of the monochord. It continues with the pitches of the gamut or scale, the hexachord system, the staff, B♮ and B♭, and mutation. Then follows the portion of this work that was subsequently most renowned: the positing of 13 intervals in music, from the unison to the octave, with full explanations and examples of each. According to the secondary evidence of the treatise of Lambertus, the Introductio musicae planae secundum magistrum Johannem de Garlandia, and Guy de Saint-Denis, the teaching of De plana musica must have concluded with a discussion of the church modes, but this is not found in the extant reportationes.

3. 'DE MENSURABILI MUSICA'. The anonymous original version of De mensurabili musica is the first treatise to give full-scale treatment to the rhythmic element of music and its notation, and this work is also the earliest comprehensive theoretical discussion of the polyphony of the Notre Dame epoch, in which rhythm for the first time became a major factor. (Although the far briefer anonymous Discantus positio vulgaris apparently originated in the 1230s, it survives only in the updated redaction preserved by Hieronymus de Moravia.) De mensurabili musica was the point of departure for almost all subsequent treatments of mensural theory in the 13th century, whether their authors were of conservative or more radical mind; in basic concepts, the order and treatment of topics, and even specific wording, these later discussions give clear evidence of the immense and fundamental influence of this treatise. This may well be one reason why the name of Johannes de Garlandia became associated with De mensurabili musica and several later compendia as an authority figure on musica practica, both polyphony and plainchant – such a seminal treatise on the notation of rhythm needed attribution.

With an approach that hints at a scholastic background, De mensurabili musica systematizes musical practice into a fully rationalized and methodical presentation. Not surprisingly, this sometimes leads to modifications and improvements upon earlier traditional procedures as found in the practical polyphonic sources, for, like all good theorists, the author both prescribed as well as described. He began by defining musica mensurabilis as organum in the general sense: all measured music, subdivided according to the rhythmic relations between the parts into discant, copula and organum in the special sense. Because discant, defined as the simultaneous sounding of different melodies according to mode and the equivalence of one to another, is fully measured in both parts, almost half the treatise is devoted to rhythmic matters before taking up the three species of polyphony in turn.

(i) Rhythm. In its consideration of rhythm, De mensurabili musica launches immediately into a discussion of the six RHYTHMIC MODES, explaining their rhythmic patterns and giving musical examples of each. The next topic covers the form of single notes and of ligatures, including rules for reading the rhythm of ligatures. This information is then applied to the notation of the different rhythmic modes, both perfect and imperfect, with single-line examples showing the pattern of ligatures for each. Continuing its logical progression, the treatise next defines rests or pauses and their notation; included are the recta brevis, the longa, the finis punctorum, the divisio modorum, the divisio sillabarum and the suspiratio.

While the primary purpose of De mensurabili musica was to give a full theoretical systematization of modal rhythm as it had developed in the music of the Notre Dame composers, the author's very concern for thoroughness led him to introduce innovations and improvements upon traditional practice – improvements designed to clarify certain ambiguities. It was this treatise that introduced signs of different length to specify rests of different durations, and its basic formulation became standard when it was adopted by Franco of Cologne; only Lambertus suggested a different system. It was also apparently this treatise that first introduced a graphic distinction in single notes between the 'correct' long (of two tempora), the duplex long, the plicated long, the 'correct' breve, the plicated breve and the semibreve. Equally significant, it was De mensurabili musica that introduced the concept of propriety and perfection in ligatures, an idea that ultimately proved of far-reaching importance for the whole mensural system (see NOTATION, §III, 3).

As the treatise explains, the propriety of a ligature involves the shape of its beginning. A normal ligature is written 'with propriety' and its rhythm is thus read normally. However, if the beginning is written abnormally, it is either 'without propriety', indicating a complete reversal of its normal rhythmic values, or 'with opposite propriety', indicating a compression of durational value so that all notes before the final one total the length of a breve. Use of ligatures without propriety applies solely to the first two modes and should take place only when special clarification is needed. In the modal theory of De mensurabili musica the perfection or imperfection of a ligature has no direct effect upon its rhythm (as it does in later mensural theory) but refers only to the completeness or incompleteness of the ligature. If a syllable change, pitch repetition or the like causes a ligature to be split in two, it is thereby made 'imperfect' and must be mentally reassembled for proper rhythmic interpretation.

These three major innovations with which *De mensurabili musica*supplied modal theory, made purely in the interest of resolving ambiguities, ultimately rendered the theory itself unnecessary. If single notes, rests and ligatures were able to acquire more specific rhythmic values that depended less and less on context, strict adherence to the six rhythmic paradigms of the modal system became less and less necessary. The two other chief innovators in 13th-century rhythmic theory, Lambertus and Franco, came to growing realization of this fact as they built on the foundation of De mensurabili musica. Among the practical sources, the notational ideas of De mensurabili musica(together with some from Lambertus) are reflected to a substantial degree only in the Bamberg motet manuscript (D-BAs Ed.IV.6), which may in fact be directly contemporary with the treatise.

(ii) Polyphony. The classification of consonant and dissonant intervals in De mensurabili musica, which follows the treatment of rhythm and its notation, became one of the treatise's most widely disseminated theoretical concepts. Of the six consonant intervals, the 'perfect' consonances are the unison and the octave; the 'imperfect' consonances are the major and minor 3rds; and the 'medial' consonances (those 'between' perfect and imperfect) are the 5th and the 4th. The seven dissonant intervals are similarly divided: 'perfect' dissonances are the semitone, the tritone and the major 7th; 'imperfect' dissonances are the major 6th and minor 7th; and 'medial' dissonances are the whole tone and the minor 6th. The succeeding discussion supports this classification with the numerical ratios for the intervals, indicating that the most consonant intervals have the simplest proportions.

The last three chapters of the treatise are devoted to the three species of musica mensurabilis – DISCANT, COPULA and ORGANUM. Discant receives the bulk of the author's attention, for that lengthy treatment amounts to one-third of the work, whereas discussion of copula and organum is very brief. In the chapter on discant, each rhythmic mode is shown in contrapuntal combination with itself and with each of the other five modes; some of the resulting combinations are completely unknown in the practical sources. This discussion is liberally illustrated with two-part examples apparently composed directly for inclusion in the treatise. The Vatican manuscript breaks off near the end of this chapter, and in his critical edition Reimer reconstructed the following two chapters (12 and 13) based on the revised version in Hieronymus de Moravia and quotations from the original version in the St Emmeram anonymus and Anonymus 4.

The brief comments on copula describe it as 'between discant and organum'. The substance of these remarks indicates that if discant is characterized by strict modal rhythm in both parts, copula is marked by modal rhythm in the upper voice over a sustained (organal) note in the tenor; organum is distinguished by sustained notes in the tenor and a rhythm not strictly modal (modus non rectus) in the upper part. Organum thus not being measured in the regular way that discant and copula are, the treatise offers three somewhat contradictory rules for distinguishing longs and breves in this species: longs in the upper voice are recognizable because they are consonant with the tenor, because they are notated as longs, or because they are heard before a long rest or before a perfect consonance. The only mention of three-voice organum (organum cum alio) is to distinguish it from the two-voice variety (organum per se), as the two upper voices of a three-voice organum proceed in a discanting relationship using modal rhythm.

(iii) Revision. In the revised version of the treatise attributed by Hieronymus de Moravia to Johannes de Garlandia, which Reimer distinguished by the title De musica mensurabili positio, the first two chapters differ significantly from the beginning of the anonymous De mensurabili musica in its two earlier manuscript sources (I-Rvat lat.5325; B-BRs 528, also from 13th-century Paris). In Johannes de Garlandia's revision, the rhythmic modes are first described as the 'six ancient modes' (sex modos antiquos); there is no mention of organum; and some of the technical terms indicate that this version must postdate the treatises of Lambertus and Franco. Additional new material (forming chapters 14–16) at the end of the work discusses three-voice composition (tripla), musical 'color' and vocal ornamentation, and four-voice composition (quadrupla), the latter with a passing reference to the works of Magister Perotinus.

4. Historical position. The combined traditions of all the manuscripts containing 'Garlandian' material seem to imply that with a copy of Boethius's speculative treatise together with the anonymous De plana musica and De mensurabili musica, a university student in Paris about 1260–80 would have had all the written music theory he needed to make him a musicus. Testimony about the teachings, now attributed to Johannes de Garlandia, continues in the 14th century not only from Guy de Saint-Denis (*c*1315) but also from the Englishmen Roger Caperon (Commentum super cantum) and Robert de Handlo (Regule, 1326). Caperon called Johannes de Garlandia his revered teacher, and Handlo cited him for ideas about the division of the semibreve into minims. Although the latter treatment clearly pertains to early 14th-century notational theory, if Johannes de Garlandia was actually a contemporary of Hieronymus de Moravia, rather than a mid-13th-century theorist, it is entirely plausible that he should have participated in the developments leading to the Ars Nova. A subsequent hint of this possibility is the incorporation of part of the Introductio musicae planae secundum magistrum Johannem de Garlandia into the Ars contrapunctus secundum Philippum de Vitriaco (CoussemakerS, iii, 23–7) and the ascription of the latter treatise in one manuscript source to Johannes de Garlandia (which led Coussemaker to edit yet another, anonymous version under Garlandia's name: Optima introductio in contrapunctum pro rudibus, ibid., 12–13).

The complicated transmission and derivative sources of the Garlandian treatises led Coussemaker, Riemann and others to postulate both an older (13th-century) and a younger (14th-century) music theorist named Johannes de Garlandia. It now seems more likely that only one person bore this name, whose career in Paris spanned the last decades of the 13th century and the first decades of the 14th; on the other hand, the most important writings associated with Johannes de Garlandia, De plana musica and De mensurabili musica, were probably the work of another, nameless author active about the middle of the 13th century. The tremendous accomplishment of this anonymous theorist in systematizing the rhythmic modes and their notation should not be underestimated merely because these matters quickly underwent change and modification. The whole mensural system, and indeed the development of late-medieval polyphony itself, would not have been possible without the systematic formulation of the theory of Notre Dame polyphony in De mensurabili musica.

REBECCA A. BALTZER

Johannes de Grocheio. See GROCHEIO, JOHANNES DE.

Johannes de Janua (fl 1400). Italian composer. He came from Genoa (Lat. Janua), where he may have composed his two surviving works (in I-MOe α.M.5.24) under French influence: in the early 15th century Genoa was an important centre of French culture, as it belonged to France. Several candidates for the identity of the composer have been proposed: two, Johannes Burec and Johannes Desrame, were singers at the court of Pope Benedict XIII, who after his flight from Avignon, lived with his curia in the Minorite monastery in Genoa in 1405 and in 1407. Other, perhaps more likely, Italian candidates for identification are the 'frater Johannes' of Genoa (a colleague of Conradus de Pistoria), listed in 1385 at the Florentine convent of Santo Spirito, or the musician 'Jo. de Genesii' who worked in the chapels of various Avignon cardinals between 1371 and 1394. Johannes de Janua's two surviving three-part songs, the ballade Une dame requis (ed. in PMFC, xx, 1982) and the virelai Ma douce amour et ma sperance (ed. in PMFC, xxi, 1987), correspond in text and style to French models of the late 14th century: the ballade in particular displays cross-rhythms and syncopation, characteristics of the Ars Subtilior. That Johannes's works were well circulated in northern Italy is suggested by the inclusion of the virelai text in a lyric poetry source linked to the Pavian court of Giangaleazzo Visconti (d 1402).

URSULA GÜNTHER/YOLANDA PLUMLEY

Johannes de Lymburgia [Vinandi, Johannes] (fl 1431). Franco-Flemish composer, active in Italy. All his 46 ascribed compositions are in I-Bc Q15; only three are preserved elsewhere (one ascribed to Du Fay, one to 'Lynburgia'). Five other works in I-Bc Q15 have been attributed to him by modern scholars. There is only one documentary reference to him known: on 18 November 1431 in the palace of Bishop Pietro Emiliani of Vicenza 'presbitero Johanne cantore de Limburgia q. Johannis Vinandi, beneficiato ecclesie vincentine' was among the witnesses to the will of another of Emiliani's familiars. He may have been associated with Emiliani's provision of the previous month for training young singers (Gallo and Mantese). It seems likely that none of the three men identified from references in the Liège archives (Quitin) was the composer; Quitin opined that the solution to the composer's identity must come from Italy. This is supported by the fact that all three men were documented as being in or near Liège in the 1430s, whereas work had begun on the second stage of Q15, in which Johannes alone is named, in 1430 or before; he has even been considered as a candidate for the scribe of the manuscript, started in the early 1420s. Against any of the available identifications from the north it can be argued that his compositions indeed show the influence of composers active in the Veneto during the 1420s. He is probably the 'presbiter Johannes de Francia' present in Padua throughout the 1420s and on whose behalf and implicit strength as a singer the Padua chapter successfully petitioned Bishop Pietro Marcello in 1424 for a vacant custody. His pieces in honour of the city of Padua and of Giovanni Contarini are likely to have been written in that decade, when he and Emiliani were there, and he is almost certainly the same as the 'Johannes de Francia cantore' who moved to Emiliani's household well before 1431 and accompanied him from Padua to Vicenza in the late 1420s, when he would have written Martires Dei incliti, surely intended for celebrations on 20 August of Vicenza's patron saints Leonzio and Carpoforo, in accordance with a civic statute of 1425.

Of the other works, Gaude felix Padua and In hac die celebri celebrate saints honoured in Padua (Gaude felix Padua and O Baptista mirabilis are almost illegible in the manuscript). Congruit mortalibus was written in honour of Giovanni Contarini, a member of Emiliani's circle. Ann Lewis has demonstrated anti-Semitic elements in the three texts of the motet Tu, nephanda (suggesting a date following 1434). The four-voice works all have equal discantus parts (sometimes imitative, as in Tota pulchra es), as does the three-voice Surexit Cristus.

His musical style is rather uniform. Most pieces are in three parts, with a songlike texted upper voice and untexted equal-range tenor and contratenor, usually in tempus perfectum. The upper parts are often florid and ornamented; chant is sometimes paraphrased in the discant or presented in the tenor. Discant and tenor are written out in his fauxbourdon works. His complete mass may in fact be composite; the Introit (Salve sancta parens), Kyrie (Kyrie IX) and Gloria 'Spiritus et alme' may have been modelled on the composite Lantins mass that opens I-Bc Q15. The Kyrie 'Qui de stirpe regia' opens a composite cycle with a Gloria-Credo pair by Brassart and a Sanctus-Agnus pair by Du Fay. The single Credo is paired with a Gloria by Reson; the two Gloria-Credo pairs are united by head-motifs. The frequent indications of 'unus' and 'chorus' are characteristic of the scribe and may not be authorial. Three anonymous compositions in I-Bc Q15 are particularly strong candidates for Johannes' authorship, which could perhaps be extended to a few other unascribed compositions.

The non-liturgical strophic settings of Latin texts (usually classified as laude) show a variety of texting practices. Two have three-line stanzas with three-line refrains, two have four-line stanzas with two-line refrains and one has a five-line stanza with no refrain. His hymn settings have a number of alternatim strategies, some with alternative settings, some with odd and some with even verses set polyphonically. They seem, along with a setting by Feragut, to have been designed to complement the – presumably pre-existing – cycle by Du Fay, of which this is the oldest source. Johannes' five Magnificats are in the newer style that supplanted earlier settings discarded from Q15.

MARGARET BENT

Johannes de Meruco (fl late 14th century). Composer, probably French. He was the author of the four-voice ballade De home vray (ed. in CMM liii, 1970 and PMFC, xix, 1982). Like other ballades from the Chantilly Manuscript (F-CH 564), this one makes frequent use of syncopation in cantus and contratenor, as well as a chordal opening to the refrain. Less usual is the imitation between cantus and triplum over four bars of the refrain, producing identical rhythm in three of them.

GILBERT REANEY

Johannes de Muris. See MURIS, JOHANNES DE.

Johannes de Olomons, Magister (fl early 15th century). Italian music theorist. He came from Olmütz, in Moravia, and is also known as 'scholasticus de Casteliono'. He is known by a single treatise Palma choralis seu de cantu ecclesiastico (ed. A. Seay, Colorado Springs, 1977), dedicated to Cardinal Branda da Castiglione, of whom he also wrote a biography. The treatise was probably written between 1425 and 1443, his years of service as the cardinal's chaplain (the number '1405' on the manuscript is probably a shelf-mark). Although written in an area near Milan, his tract deals with Ambrosian chant only in passing.

GORDON A. ANDERSON/R

Johannes de Quadris [Quatris] (b before 1410; d after 1456). Italian composer. A priest from the diocese of Valva-Sulmona near L'Aquila, he is described in a document of 1450 as 'musicus et cantor diu in ecclesia Santi Marci de Venetiis'. His long ('diu') service at S Marco seems to have lasted at least two decades, since his Magnificat is headed '1436, in the month of May, in Venice' in GB-Ob Can.misc.213, and it is not until a Vatican document of 1457 that he is referred to as deceased (see Lütteken). In 1450 he presented a petition to Pope Nicholas V to obtain a prebend linked to a vacant post at the collegiate church of SS Felice e Fortunato in Aquileia. This request was not granted immediately because another application for the same benefice had been presented at the same time. Johannes therefore repeated his request in 1452 and again in 1454; in 1457 it seems that the benefice was granted to his competitor, presumably because Johannes had died.

Analysis of the works definitely attributable from their sources to Johannes de Quadris reveals a remarkable stylistic diversity. The Magnificat and the motet Gaudeat ecclesia both clearly betray their late Gothic origins. The Magnificat, one of the earliest polyphonic settings, displays varied treatment of the cantus firmus (3rd psalm tone) and a careful and imaginative handling of the two vocal parts. The hymn Iste confessor (which may have been the model for a similar composition by Antonius Janue) is restrained and singable, qualities that also characterize the Lamentations and the pieces for Good Friday. In these works the music is entirely at the service of the words. The Lamentations (in which the cantus firmus is very close to the traditional tonus lamentationum) are constructed in a strophic form in which the pattern is constantly repeated and modified, like a liturgical recitative. Only the final cadences are extended and offer four different types of resolution. The other works for the Passion listed below, especially the planctus Cum autem venissem, are very much in the style of the Lamentations; even if they are not by Johannes de Quadris, they were certainly inspired by his compositions. Taken as a whole, his output developed in a way typical of the 15th century, from a northern late Gothic idiom to the expressive, tuneful simplicity of Italian music.

Johannes's music enjoyed widespread and lasting circulation, as is apparent from the presence of his works in I-Ps 359. The Lamentations appeared in a Petrucci print (1506[1]) so much later than the GB-Ob copy of the Magnificat that earlier scholars supposed the works to be by different composers with the same name (a hypothesis rejected by Cattin, 1969; see also Bent, 1995). The Lamentations are also in the Processio Veneris sancti in I-Fd 21 (see Cattin, 1975), and were replaced at S Marco only by those of Giovanni Croce published in 1603 and 1610 (see Bettley, 1993 and 1994). As well as being an important figure in his own right, therefore, Johannes de Quadris is also of great significance for the history of polyphonic practice at S Marco in the 15th and 16th centuries.

GIULIO CATTIN

Johannes de Sacrobosco [Sacro Buscho] (*fl c*1220). Scientist and pseudo-theorist, possibly English. He was the author of a Tractatus de sphaera which was the standard textbook of astronomy from the 13th century to the 17th and exists in numerous manuscript copies. According to a 13th-century tradition, Sacrobosco was an Englishman, and it has been conjectured that his name was Holywood or Holyrood. His connection with music is illusory, deriving from the fact that a copy of the Sphaera heads a collection of treatises mostly on music in a manuscript (I-Rv B81) copied in Italy during the 11th and 12th centuries.

FREDERICK HAMMOND

Johannes de Sarto. See SARTO, JOHANNES DE.

Johannes 'dictus Primarius' (fl Paris, 13th century). Musician, probably a theorist but perhaps also a scribe or composer, active in France. Along with Petrus optimus notator and others he was involved in the later transmission of the Magnus liber and related collections of mensural polyphony, between the time of Robertus de Sabilone and that of Franco of Cologne. He is mentioned under this name by the theorist Anonymus 4 (ed. Reckow, 1967, i, 46, 50), who stated that his work was superseded by the new notational features of Franco. Several scholars have suggested identification with JOHANNES DE GARLANDIA (see O. Koller, VMw, iv, 1888, pp.1–82, esp. 34; Reckow, 1967, i, 97–8).

Johannesen, Grant (b Salt Lake City, 30 July 1921). American pianist. He studied the piano with Robert Casadesus at Princeton University and Egon Petri at Cornell University, and theory with Roger Sessions and Nadia Boulanger. He made his début at Times Hall, New York, in 1944. In 1949 he won first prize at the Concours International at Ostend and also undertook his first international tour. In 1956 and 1957 he toured Europe with the New York PO and Mitropoulos. He made an extensive tour of the USSR and Europe with the Cleveland Orchestra and Szell in 1968, and solo tours of the USSR in 1962 and 1970; he also appeared regularly at the leading festivals in the USA and Europe. He was on the faculty of the Aspen Music School (1960–66) and in 1973 became music consultant and adviser to the Cleveland Institute of Music of which he was later music director (from 1974) and president (from 1977); he announced his resignation in 1984. His honours include the Harriet Cohen International Award (1960) and doctorates from the University of Utah (1968) and the Cleveland Institute of Music (1975). An intelligent, sensitive, restrained player over a broad repertory, Johannesen is best known for his performances of French music. He has championed the piano music of Fauré, which he has recorded complete, and celebrated the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth in 1995 with an all-Fauré recital in London. He has recorded, too, such unusual material as the Dukas Variations and works by Roussel and De Séverac. His compositions include Improvisations over a Mormon Hymn as well as cadenzas to Classical concertos. From 1963 to 1973 he was married to the cellist Zara Nelsova, with whom he often appeared in concerts and made recordings.

MICHAEL STEINBERG/R

Johannes Filius Dei, Magister (fl mid-13th century). English singer. He was one of three Englishmen described by the theorist Anonymus 4 as 'good singers' of mensural polyphony, who sang with great refinement ('valde deliciose'). Some time before 1295 he bequeathed a troper to St Paul's Cathedral, London, where he may have been a canon. Flindell's contention that he was the 11th/12th-century theorist Johannes Cotto is without foundation. The appellation 'Filius Dei' (Godson) may imply that he was a foundling.

Johannes Fulginatis [Giovanni da Foligno] (fl ?*c*1400). Italian composer. His name indicates that he came from Foligno. A two-voice ballata by him, Mercede, o donna, written probably in about 1400, is transmitted in I-La 184 (f.LXXX; ed. in PMFC, x, 1977, p.90). Another three-voice ballata, L'angeli ch'alma, found in the recently discovered fragment PL-Pm 174*a* (dated 1432), written in senaria imperfecta, bears an inscription that may be to him.

Johannes le Fauconer, Magister (fl 13th century). Composer or scribe from Picardy. He was involved in the later transmission of the Magnus liber and related collections of mensural polyphony, working probably in Paris between the time of Robertus de Sabilone and that of Franco. He is mentioned by the theorist Anonymus 4 (ed. Reckow, 1967, i, 50).

Johannes Scottus Eriugena [John Scotus Erigena; John the Scot] (b Ireland, *c*810; d ?England, *c*877). Theologian, philosopher and translator. He arrived in Gaul in about 845 and taught grammar and dialectic at the palace school of Charles the Bald, of which he is also thought to have been the head for a time. The story told by William of Malmesbury that he died in England, stabbed to death by the pens of his pupils, is considered legend. His early theological writings rendered him open to attack in the late 850s. Between about 860 and 865 he translated a number of works from Greek at the behest of Emperor Charles. His masterpiece, the De divisione naturae (also called Periphiseon) was completed, it is thought, between 860 and 867. It presents a transcendental philosophy that in the opinion of modern scholarship is unequalled in its time for profundity and originality. Whether it was influential in subsequent centuries is unclear, although it was condemned as heretical by Pope Honorius III in 1225 and subjected to censorship in the 17th century.

Certain passages of the De divisione naturae (especially Eriugena's mention of the terms 'organicum melos' and 'organicus') have been the subject of discussion by several music historians, notably Hugo Riemann and Jacques Handschin. According to the former, Eriugena undoubtedly made reference to organum in contrary or oblique motion, an opinion evidently shared by Handschin and often repeated since. Many difficulties in the interpretation of these passages (PL, cxxii, 638 and 883 respectively) arise from ambiguities unavoidable at this epoch in the meaning of 'organum' and its derivatives, and indeed of all terms referring to consonance. Both Jones and Waeltner have successfully challenged the older interpretation. What should be noted is that these passages tell nothing of the specific characteristics of such singing parts (e.g. whether sacred or secular in use, liturgical or non-liturgical, extempore or written, whether having association with an ethnic group). Information of that sort would be irrelevant to the usefulness as analogue or symbol in Eriugena's metaphysics of the phenomenon of polyphony.

Handschin proposed, on the basis of some conceptual similarities, that Eriugena must have read the Musica enchiriadis, a work that has generally been dated a generation later. This suggestion has been supported by Dronke on the grounds of Eriugena's interpretation of the Orpheus allegory. De divisione naturae contains a fair number of other passing references to music, discussed in some detail by Handschin. The commentary on MARTIANUS CAPELLA attributed to Eriugena is almost certainly the work of the Irish scholar; although it reveals an acquaintance with musical concepts and vocabulary such as he might have gained through quadrivial education, it demonstrates little beyond that. There are, however, many problems concerning the completeness of the various Carolingian commentaries on Martianus, and scholars today are in general agreement that Eriugena's commentary has survived only in a condensed form.

LAWRENCE GUSHEE/BRADLEY JON TUCKER

Jóhannsson, Magnús Blöndal (b Skálar, 8 Sept 1925). Icelandic composer, pianist and conductor. He studied with Franz Mixa and Victor Urbancic at the Reykjavík College of Music (1935–7, 1939–45) and with Bernard Wagenaar and Marion Bauer at the Juilliard School (1947–53). He was active as répétiteur and conductor at the Icelandic National Theatre (1956–69), and was a producer at the Icelandic State Broadcasting Service until 1974; he was also a founder member of Musica Nova in 1959. After a period in the USA (1977–87), he took up residence again in Iceland.

In the 1950s and early 60s Jóhannsson was at the forefront of the Icelandic avant garde. His Fjórar abstraksjónir ('Four Abstractions', 1951) for piano was the first Icelandic 12-note composition; he was also a pioneer in electronic music, composing his Elektrónísk stúdía for woodwind quintet, piano and tape in 1958. In 1971 he stopped composing for almost a decade; this extended silence was eventually broken with his Adagio (1980) for strings, celesta and percussion, which marks a significant stylistic shift in his music. Like the works which followed, it abandons his earlier experimental style for a more simple, neo-romantic lyricism.

Johanos, Donald (b Cedar Rapids, IA, 10 Feb 1928). American conductor. He studied the violin and conducting at the Eastman School, Rochester, and was a violinist with the Rochester PO for five years. Its conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, coached him, and in 1953 Johanos first conducted the orchestras at Altoona and Johnstown, Pennsylvania. In 1954 awards from the American Symphony Orchestra League and the Rockefeller Foundation enabled him to spend three years working with Ormandy, Beecham, Klemperer, Karajan and others. He won the 1957 International Conducting Competition of the Netherlands Radio Union, which led to appearances with the Concertgebouw Orchestra. He became associate conductor of the Dallas SO the same year and was its musical director from 1962 to 1970. In 1971 he was appointed associate conductor of the Pittsburgh SO and director of its chamber orchestra. He became music director of the Honolulu SO and artistic director of the Hawaii Opera Theatre in 1979. Johanos's recordings, especially of Ives's Holidays with the Dallas SO, reveal a lyrical approach and a careful sense of structure, sustained by rhythmic stability and momentum.

RICHARD BERNAS

Johansen, David Monrad (b Vefsn, Nordland, 8 Nov 1888; d Sandvika, 20 Feb 1974). Norwegian composer. At the Oslo Conservatory he studied the piano with Winge and Johnson (1904–9), then theory with Elling and Holter, and the piano with Nissen (1909–15). He continued his studies with Humperdinck and Kahn in Berlin (1915–16) and during the 1920s he travelled to Paris and Italy. In 1933 and 1935 he was a pupil of Grabner in Leipzig. Johansen made his début as a pianist in 1910 and as a composer in 1915, each time in Oslo, and he first conducted in 1938 in Bergen. He was editor of the Norsk musikerblad (1917–18) and music critic for the Norske intelligenssedler (1916–18) and the Aftenposten (1925–45). During the years 1917–32 he was periodically a member of the executive committee of the Norwegian Composers Association, and he served on its expert council from 1956 to 1966. He was president of the TONO (1929–45). Between 1925 and 1945 he received a state artist's salary.

Johansen is perhaps the most outstanding of those Norwegian composers who have continued the nationalist tradition into the mid-20th century. An important stimulus to his work has been the folk poetry and legends, and above all the peasant music, of Norway. He has not used these tunes as 'cliché-marked national formulas ... it is rather a question of admitting the musical possibilities latent in the folk music' (Sommerfeldt). Johansen's music, although not extensively pictorial in conception, is also coloured by the landscape of the Nordland. Strong and vital, his work is distinguished by broad lines and a vigorous harmony that often employs old Nordic chords for archaic effect. Polyphony is frequently important, and classical forms and means of development play a significant part. In some works of about 1920 – the Nordlandsbilleder, the Seven Songs op.6, the To portrætter fra middelalderen and parts of Nordlands trompet – there are Impressionist traits such as parallel chords and augmented triads, features resulting from Johansen's acquaintance with Debussy's music at that time. There are traces of Valen's influence in the cantata Ignis ardens, written after Johansen had met his compatriot in Paris. Other important works include the choral pieces Draumkvædet and Voluspaa, the orchestral Pan suggested by Hamsun's novel, the Symfoniske variasjoner, the Piano Concerto and the String Quartet.

KARI MICHELSEN

Johansen, Gunnar (b Copenhagen, 21 Jan 1906; d Blue Mounds, WI, 25 May 1991). American pianist and composer of Danish birth. From the age of ten he received lessons in piano and theory from his violinist father, and at 12 he made his first public appearance, inspired by the example of Ignaz Friedman, whom he had heard the previous year. Friedman's student Victor Schiøler persuaded Johansen's parents to allow their son to study in Berlin, first with Frederic Lamond and then with Egon Petri at the Hochschule für Musik (1922–4). The studies with Petri not only enabled Johansen to refine his technical command of the instrument but they also formed the basis of many of his subsequent musical and aesthetic values. During this period he moved among the Busoni circle, and in May 1923 gave the première of Busoni's Zehn Variationen über ein Präludium von Chopin. Between 1924 and 1929 he toured Europe before moving to the USA, where he made weekly radio broadcasts for NBC (1930–36) in addition to championing recent works such as Ravel's G major Concerto and Rachmaninoff's Fourth Concerto. In 1935 he presented a cycle of 12 historical recitals, with music ranging from Frescobaldi to Stravinsky, and he repeated the feat in several cities across the USA. He was also active as a chamber musician. From 1939 Johansen was artist-in-residence at the University of Wisconsin, a position he held until his retirement in 1976. In the earlier part of his tenure (1946–53) he presented broadcast series in which he performed the complete piano works of Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, Chopin and Bach, as well as a cycle devoted to the development of the piano sonata. He also became involved in the technical possibilities of recording offered by magnetic tape, and from his private studio he issued a series devoted to the complete keyboard works of Bach and one devoted to the piano music of Busoni, Friedman and, most notably, Liszt. In addition, he recorded works by Grieg, Chopin, Reger, Godowsky and himself. His own compositions, many of which were improvised directly on to tape, reveal a remarkable assimilation of diverse styles yet with a distinctively personal voice. All these performances are notable for Johansen's technical mastery and questing intellect, an intellect not only directed towards music but also to a wide-ranging field of scholarship and interdisciplinary research through his own Leonardo Academy.

CHARLES HOPKINS

Johanson, Sven-Eric (Emanuel) (b Västervik, 10 Dec 1919; d Göteborg, 29 Sept 1997). Swedish composer. After attending the Ingesund College of Music (1938) he studied composition with Melchers at the Royal College of Music, Stockholm (1939–46), and privately with Rosenberg. He was an organist in Uppsala (1944–50) and from 1952 worked as a church musician and teacher in Göteborg. A superb improviser on the organ and on the piano, he was a founder member of the Monday Group in the 1940s. He became a member of the Royal Swedish Academy of Music in 1971. Having made intensive studies of Gregorian chant and Palestrinian polyphony, he found the basis for his own work in Hindemith's counterpoint. This he gradually developed in an individual manner, applying the 12-note technique first loosely in the Sinfonia ostinata and the Saxophone Sonata, then rigorously in such pieces as the Sinfonietta concertante and the Tio epigram for piano. Melodic elasticity, as well as a very personal harmonic and rhythmic serialism, mark his later work, and Johanson was ready to explore the newest developments, as in the electronic modification of instrumental sound of the Hommaggio a Boccaccio (1972). Among his most important works is his Symphony no.3 'Etemenanki' ('The Elements', 1965–8), a symphony whose movements bear the names of the ancient elements: water, fire, air, earth; his late symphonies are also noteworthy. Through his teaching Johanson enabled amateur musicians and choirs to master advanced techniques.

ROLF HAGLUND

Johansson, Bengt (b Helsinki, 2 Oct 1914; d Ruovesi, 22 June 1989). Finnish composer. He studied conducting, the cello and composition at the Sibelius Academy in Helsinki, where his teachers were Madetoja, Palmgren and Ranta. He spent most of his working life as a sound engineer at the Finnish Broadcasting Company (1952–75) while also teaching music history at the Sibelius Academy. Both activities proved useful to him in his work: his Kolme elektronista etydiä ('Three Electronic Etudes', 1960) was one of the pioneering examples of Finnish electronic music, and his works for voices, in which features drawn from Renaissance polyphony appear alongside modernist elements, occupy a central place in the contemporary Finnish choral repertory.

His early orchestral works of the late 1940s and early 50s were still in the national Romantic vein. Not until his choral works of the 1960s and 70s, most of them a cappella, did Johansson discover his personal 'antique' style. In overall mood these works are modal and softly dissonant, at the same time both archaic and modern, combining madrigal styles with contemporary polyphonic web techniques in a balanced synthesis. His interest in the sacred tradition is already manifest in his Stabat mater of 1951, but his new style was not established until The Tomb at Akr Çaar for baritone and mixed chorus (1964). In addition to texts by Ezra Pound and poets of earlier centuries, Johansson drew on the Bible and on traditional Latin texts, for instance in his largest works with orchestral accompaniment, the Missa sacra and Requiem.

MIKKO HEINIÖ

John I, King of Aragon (b Perpignan, 1350; ruled 1387–95; d Foixà, nr Gerona, 16 May 1395). Portuguese ruler and patron of music, son of Pedro IV 'el Ceremonioso' and Eleonor of Sicily. He was the chief means through which the musical currents of international Gothic were introduced into the Iberian peninsula; he was also one of the outstanding musical patrons of his time. From early on he revealed his love of music, surrounding himself with as many skilled performers as possible, especially shawm players. Francophile in his tastes, he hardly ever had in his service musicians who were not French, German or Franco-Flemish, employing up to 22 of them in his household. His own musicians and those who came to visit him included, in his own words, 'the best in the whole world'; he was generous to all of them, and did all he could to further their careers through letters of recommendation. Among the several hundreds of musicians known to have visited him, 'master Simon of the viola', perhaps identifiable with the composer Hasprois, and 'Petrequi de la bombarda' (Bombardi) stand out. 'Johan Robert' (Trebor) dedicated two of his compositions to him, En seumeillant and Quant joyne cuer (F-CH 564, nos.20 and 40). John did not have his own chapel until 1379, on the eve of his marriage to the niece of the King of France, Yolanda de Bar. Around that time he summoned seven singers from Avignon to whom he added the tenor Johan Armer. With their help he composed for New Year 1380 a rondel 'ab sa tenor e contratenor e ab son cant', a copy of which he sent to his brother Martín. The composition is lost, as are almost all the music books he bought and even commissioned in Avignon. These included parts of the Mass as well as polyphonic motets, rondeaux, ballades and virelais. It is possible that some sheets containing copies of Ars Nova motets (E-TAc (1) and (2)) came from one of these books. The loss of documentation relating to John's chapel makes it impossible to follow the course of his musical evolution. We know only that between 1380 and 1395 fifteen singers and five organists belonged to it, among them Steve de Sort. Without exception, all these musicians had received their training either in the cathedrals of northern France and the Low Countries or in Avignon. Their presence in John's chapel contributed decisively to the modernization of the sacred polyphonic repertory in the kingdom of Aragon.

John IV. See JOÃO IV.

John XXII [Duèse, Jacques] (b Cahors, *c*1245; d 1334). French pope. A member of a well-to-do family, he studied at Cahors, Montpellier, Paris and Orléans and taught canon and civil law at Cahors and Toulouse. In 1300 he was consecrated Bishop of Fréjus. In 1308 he became chancellor to Charles II of Naples and two years later was appointed to the See of Avignon. Raised to the purple in 1312, he was created Cardinal-priest of S Vitale and, in 1313, Cardinal-Bishop of Oporto. His election to the papacy came in 1316; at a time of great confusion and discord this elderly candidate with his ailing appearance was acceptable because it seemed unlikely that he would live long. He was, however, to prove an energetic and authoritarian ruler during his reign at Avignon. In 1317 he dissolved the Spiritual Franciscans and denounced as heretical their doctrine of total poverty. His conflict with Louis of Bavaria ended only with the recantation in 1330 of the antipope Nicholas V set up two years previously by Louis, and by Louis' own abdication in 1332.

John XXII showed great interest in Eastern affairs and missionary activity, and strove to regain some of the papacy's lost power by astute administration. His encouragement of the visual arts and artists was matched by his interest in music. His decretal of 1324–5 ('Docta sanctorum patrum'; see the Extravagantes communes, bk. 3, §1; ed. in Richter and Friedberg) spoke out against the use of complex polyphony as a part of worship. Invoking patristic authority, he decreed that 'in the offices of divine praise ... the minds of all should be attentive, the text inoffensive, and the modest dignity of those who chant expressed through a peaceful manner of singing'. Masses were to be sung 'with the right rhythm, to a melody with each note clearly differentiated'. The mind rather than the ear was to be delighted, and John condemned the new polyphony; he criticized 'certain followers of a new school' who introduced short note-values into liturgical singing and masked the plainchant with higher vernacular parts: 'For these restless singers are ever on the move, intoxicating the ear instead of soothing it, striving to convey by their gestures the content of their song; and thus devotion is brought into contempt by those who should be seeking it.' However, John made it clear that he had 'no intention of prohibiting ... the occasional practice ... of adding certain consonances, such as the octave, 5th or 4th and such intervals, which enhance the melody when sung above the simple ecclesiastical chant in such a way as to leave the plainchant itself pure and intact'.

In 1334, shortly before his death, John XXII introduced the feast of Trinity Sunday.

John Chrysostom. See CHRYSOSTOM, JOHN.

John Cotton. See JOHANNES COTTO.

John Damascene [John Chrysorrhoas, John of Damascus] (b Damascus, *c*675; d St Sabas, nr Jerusalem, *c*749). Saint, Byzantine hymnographer and anti-iconoclast theologian. He was born into a rich Christian family; his father, Sergius, held an important position at the court of the Caliphs, and John, who had received a good literary and philosophical education, apparently held the same post after his father's death. Later he became a monk in the famous monastery of St Sabas. He was ordained priest by the Patriarch of Jerusalem and became his theological adviser. The most important of John's writings, The Source of Knowledge, was dedicated to Kosmas, Bishop of Maiuma (KOSMAS OF JERUSALEM). Late hagiographical writers supplied further biographical details, mostly legendary; these include the tradition that Kosmas was John's foster-brother, brought up and educated with him at Damascus. John was buried in the monastery of St Sabas; his body was later transferred to Constantinople.

John Damascene was renowned at Constantinople as the author of liturgical hymns: his biographers praised his troparia and kanōnes 'which are still sung and which give divine pleasure to all'. Tradition attributed to him the composition of the OKTŌECHOS, but he is more likely to have been the organizer than the author of this work. Many specific liturgical hymns have been attributed to him, but some were probably written by other monastic hymnographers with the name John. Those hymns in iambic verses for Christmas, Epiphany and Pentecost are most probably authentic; the ones following the rules of Byzantine rhythmic hymnography include kanōnes for Easter (the 'Golden Kanōn' or 'Queen of Kanōnes'), St Thomas, the Ascension, the Transfiguration, the Annunciation and the Dormition of the Virgin. Eustratiadēs has compiled a list with manuscript references of the many kanōnes, idiomela and stichēra prosomoia attributed to John that appear in manuscripts and in editions of Greek liturgical books (mēnaia, triōdion and pentēkostarion).

The iambic kanōnes by John Damascene are formally mannered; the ordinary poetic kanōnes, however, were written in simpler language, and the style of the minor hymns is simpler still. All of them bear witness to their author's profound biblical and theological knowledge. Their tone is generally joyful: John's favourite subject was the Resurrection. John was also well known as a musician: the musical settings of many of the hymns attributed to him may be original.

ENRICA FOLLIERI

John, Sir Elton (Hercules) [Dwight, Reginald Kenneth] (b Pinner, 25 March 1947). English composer, singer and pianist. The son of a dance band musician, he was awarded a junior exhibition to the RAM where he learned the basic principles of composition (1958–62); he was already a devotee of rock and roll and the greatest influences on his percussive piano style were Little Richard and Jerry Lee Lewis. His musical apprenticeship between the ages of 14 and 22 encompassed classical training, work as a jobbing rock musician, journeyman songwriting and performing in a local public house. He worked at the Mills Music publishing company and played the piano and sang with Bluesology, a soul and blues group which also made a few undistinguished singles before becoming the backing group for Long John Baldry. Elton John's stage name was drawn from those of Baldry and the saxophonist Elton Dean.

From 1967 he concentrated on songwriting, working with Bernie Taupin (b Sleaford, 22 May 1950), who wrote poetry influenced by Western ballads such as those composed by Marty Robbins. They first collaborated by post with John setting Taupin's verses to music; they have subsequently maintained this unusual method of working whereby the lyrics invariably preceded the music. Elton John is also notable for the speed and fluency with which he sets Taupin's words. They were contracted by Dick James Music and, after some small successes composing songs for other singers, Elton John made his first album of John-Taupin material (1969). With string arrangements by Paul Buckmaster and production by Gus Dudgeon, Empty Sky (DJM) presented him in the then fashionably singer-songwriter mode and won respectful reviews. The second album, Elton John (DJM, 1970), included the first classic John-Taupin composition, Your Song, in which John interpreted its clever yet moving lyric conceit in a confident and confidential soul-influenced style; it has subsequently been recorded by some 50 other singers.

A critically acclaimed appearance at the Troubadour Club in Los Angeles (1970) made Elton John an overnight success in the USA. He toured frequently and recorded six albums of new songs in the following five years. These included many of his best-remembered hits such as Rocket Man with its falsetto chorus, an affectionate pastiche of 1950s rock and roll in Crocodile Rock, Candle in the Wind (the lament for Marilyn Monroe which Taupin rewrote for John to sing at the funeral of Diana, Princess of Wales in 1997) and Don't go breaking my heart, a dynamic soul number recorded by John with the British singer Kiki Dee. In 1973 he set up his own record company, Rocket, and the following year he and Taupin formed Big Pig Music to publish their songs.

By the mid-1970s Elton John had formed his mature style as a composer and singer. His American-accented vocal style projected ballads and dance numbers with equal facility while his compositions favoured the keys of E flat, D flat, G flat and F flat. In comparison with the guitar-based songs of his contemporaries, his compositions showed relatively complex melodies and chord structures. His performances increasingly favoured flamboyant outrageousness over introspection, paying homage in equal parts to Little Richard and Liberace as he appeared in a series of flamboyant costumes, a style epitomized in his cameo appearance in the film of the Who's rock opera, Tommy.

In 1979 he was the first Western pop star to tour the Soviet Union, but his career faltered when the partnership with Taupin was suspended in the late 1970s. They reunited in 1982 and during the 1980s created a number of outstanding songs among which were Nikita, Sacrifice, I guess that's why they call it the blues and I'm still standing. In general, both Taupin's lyrics and Elton John's vocal performance were more reflective than in the previous decade. Despite highly publicized personal crises triggered by drug addiction, Elton John maintained his creative output in the 1990s and The Big Picture (Rocket, 1997) was his 25th studio album. In 1994 he contributed songs to the Disney cartoon The Lion King, with lyrics by Tim Rice, and won an Academy Award for Can you feel the love tonight?.

Elton John is the most prolific composer of popular music of his generation, having written and recorded several hundred songs, most with lyrics by Taupin, and was one of the most commercially successful performers of the latter part of the 20th century. He was made a CBE in 1996 and was knighted two years later.

DAVE LAING

Johner, Dominicus [Franz-Xaver Karl] (b Waldsee, 1 Dec 1874; d Beuron, 4 Jan 1955). German musicologist. After schooling in Riedlingen he studied at the Benedictine abbeys of Prague, Seckau and (from 1893) Beuron, where he was a pupil of the Kantor Ambrosius Kienle and the organist Raphael Molitor, and where he took his vows in 1894. He also studied theology at the Cucujães monastery, Portugal (1896–1900, ordained 1898), whence he was recalled to Beuron during the illness of Kienle (1900), whom he succeeded as first Kantor (1905–49). Having studied briefly with the monks from Solesmes in Appuldurcombe, Isle of Wight (1904), he helped to found the church music school of Gregoriushaus near Beuron (1906), where he taught until World War I. He also served as prior of the abbey (1913–33) and as lecturer (1925) and professor (1930–40) of choral and liturgical music at the Cologne Hochschule für Musik.

Johner was the most distinguished of German Catholic Kantors. His practical work and books of instruction in the performance of the music of his church achieved an authoritative status. His Wort und Ton im Choral (1940) is a standard text on the musical character of plainchant.

DAVID HILEY

John of Damascus. See JOHN DAMASCENE.

John of Fornsete (d 1238–9). English monk. Since the mid-19th century the name of this monk at Reading Abbey has been associated with the so-called Reading rota SUMER IS ICUMEN IN; he has been regarded as the possible scribe of the manuscript containing it (GB-Lbl Harl.978), as a direct influence on its present shape, and as the person who inspired the Latin and English words and the music. There is no evidence to support such theories, and even though his spurious fame continued to maintain itself in musical writings throughout the first half of the 20th century, John of Fornsete must be recognized as a nonentity as regards music.

John of Salisbury (b Salisbury, *c*1115; d ?Chartres, 1180). English scholar and prelate. One of the best-educated and able writers of his time, from 1136–47 he studied in Paris and Chartres under such masters as Peter Abelard and William of Conches. He served as secretary to Archbishop Theobald of Canterbury and afterwards to Archbishop Thomas Becket, and he was exiled in the service of both; he was an early promoter of the cult of St Thomas. From 1176 to his death he was Bishop of Chartres. His famous treatise on political morality, the Policraticus (1159; dedicated to Becket), has an extensive discussion of music.

Chapter six of the first book of the Policraticus is entitled 'De musica et instrumentis et modis et fructu eorum', and occurs in the context of a discussion of the pastimes of courtiers. Written in learned language, and not heavily dependent on conventional music treatises in its precise wording, the chapter deals mainly with aspects of music which John regarded as abuses. In particular he compared musica mundana and humana with musica instrumentalis, to the disadvantage of the latter: he spoke of its harmful effects, especially in connection with certain modes. The discipline of numbers rules the heavenly bodies, musica mundana and humana, but instruments can control behaviour. The Phrygian mode is to be avoided. Music can, on the other hand, diminish the power of evil and violence. The principal, and indeed the sole, use of music is in the praise of God.

In a passage frequently quoted, John objected to those who sing in an 'effeminate fashion', and whose performances 'strive to enervate astonished little souls'. These voices display a 'facility in ascent and descent, in the dividing or doubling of notes, in the repetition of phrases, and in their combination, while ... the highest notes of the scale are so mingled with the ... lowest, that the ears are almost deprived of their power to distinguish'. Writing of the 'very smooth singing of those who sing first, and those who follow, of those who sing together, and those who finish, of those who sing in between, and those who sing against others', John was almost certainly referring to polyphonic music, perhaps of the early Notre Dame school; otherwise his writing may be evidence for the performance of complex polyphony in England, although it should be noted that this passage is not untouched by literary exaggeration. His comments are not unlike those of his contemporary Aelred of Rievaulx.

John notes the instruments used at secular banquets, using terms that are clearly classical and partly biblical (cithara, lira, tympanum and tibia). Subsequent chapters contain minor references to musical instruments, and to the abuses of actors, mimes and other performers, and their audiences.

ANDREW HUGHES/RANDALL ROSENFELD

John of Tewkesbury (fl 1351–92). English friar. He was from the Custody of Bristol and was the author-compiler of the Quatuor principalia musice (GB-Ob Digby 90; CoussemakerS, iv, 200–98, shortened version iii, 334–64) and the scribe, maker and owner of the earliest extant copy of this work, completed at Oxford on 4 August 1351 and donated by John to the Oxford Franciscans in 1388 with the assent of Thomas de Kingsbury, the 26th provincial minister of the Franciscan order in England. Another book of which John was the author-compiler, scribe, maker and owner, the astronomical treatise De situ universorum (GB-Mch 6681), was completed in 1392; several passages in this work indicate that he had been at the Oxford Franciscan convent on 5 April 1353. A different John of Tewkesbury, a sophist and fellow at Merton College, Oxford, in 1304, was credited by the antiquary John Bale with several non-musical works and mentioned by Holinshed among the illustrious men who flourished in the years of Edward III.

The Quatuor principalia includes lengthy quotations from Boethius, Isidore of Seville, Guido d'Arezzo, Magister Lambertus and Franco of Cologne. In addition, the treatise expounds the principles of the Ars Nova, mentions two of Philippe de Vitry's motets (Cum statua/Hugo/ Magister invidie and Vos qui admiramini/Gratissima/ Gaude gloriosa), and includes the only known reference in an English source to the anonymous mid-14th-century motet Tant a souttille pointure/Bien pert qu'en moy n'a d'art point/Cuius pulcritudinem sol et luna mirantur preserved in the manuscripts I-IV, F-CH 564 and AS.

Johnová, Miroslava. See VORLOVÁ, SLÁVA.

Johns, Paul Emile (b Kraków, *c*1798; d Paris, 10 Aug 1860). American pianist, composer and publisher of Polish birth. He was in New Orleans by 1818, when he is recorded as taking part in a concert; he frequently played the piano, as soloist and accompanist, until 1830. He is credited with the first performance in the USA of a piano concerto by Beethoven, in 1819. In 1824 he composed A Warlike Symphony, Grand Military March, and a comic opera, The Military Stay, all now lost. He became a music dealer in 1826 and opened his own store in New Orleans in 1830, but sold it in 1846 to W.T. Mayo (who sold it in turn in 1854 to P.P. Werlein). In the early 1830s Johns published jointly with Pleyel in Paris his Album louisianais, an elegant collection of songs and piano pieces, the first music known to have been written and published in New Orleans. A few pieces of sheet music also survive. He went to Paris in 1832 and met Chopin, who subsequently dedicated his Mazurkas op.7 to Johns. Johns was organist at St Louis Cathedral in 1843–4. A cotton magnate in later life, he served as Russian consul in New Orleans from 1848 to 1860.

JOHN H. BARON

Johnsen, Hinrich [Henrik] Philip (b probably Germany, 1717; d Stockholm, 12 Feb 1779). German or Swedish composer, harpsichordist and organist. The story in Schilling's Universal-Lexicon (2/1840–42), that Johnsen was of English origin, lacks support. In all likelihood he was born, or at least grew up, in Holstein and may have been of German-Danish parentage. His serenata Die verkaufte Braut (1742) shows fluency in dealing with a German libretto, and the text is written in well-practised German style. In 1743 he went to Sweden as the director of the court orchestra of Adolf Fredrik of Holstein-Gottorp, the successor to the Swedish throne; this orchestra, which Johnsen conducted from 1763, was separate from the Swedish court orchestra until 1771.

In 1745 Johnsen became organist at the church of St Klara in Stockholm, and in 1753 kammarmusikus and the queen's teacher in thoroughbass. From about the same time he became well known as an organ teacher. In 1763 he was appointed court organist, and from 1763 to 1771 was musical director of the newly arrived French theatre group, which performed comic opera and ballet. When the Swedish Royal Academy of Music was founded in 1771 he was the keeper of the archives for the first two years as well as a teacher of harmony. In his capacity as an expert on the organ he wrote a section on the instrument in A.A. Hülpher's Historisk afhandling om musik och instrumenter (Västerås, 1773/R).

Johnsen was regarded by his contemporaries as an outstanding contrapuntist and improviser on the organ. He was also a proficient harpsichordist and was possibly one of those organists whom J.H. Roman, in a letter of the 1750s, called 'pianists'. But his name is chiefly remembered for his collection of songs, one of the very few published in Sweden before the 19th century. It contains some charming and original compositions, stylistically reminiscent of Krause and Telemann.

Johnsen's style can best be described as eclectic. His instrumental works are akin to those of C.P.E. Bach in their unprepared dissonances and modulations. The operas have an affinity with the music of Gluck's dramatic style. Reaction to this stylistic diversity was mixed. A passage in G.A. Silverstolpe's obituary of Johnsen's disciple, J. Wikmanson, refers to Johnsen's organ fugues: 'If he did not distinguish himself as especially tasteful in his imagination in the few works we have by him, and often introduced strange ideas, motley forms and harsh sounds, he did however possess an originality which made up for the genius his ear and feelings sometimes seemed to lack'. A study of, for example, his masterly, sometimes faintly bizarre harpsichord sonatas, his simple organ fugues and his trio sonatas largely confirms this opinion.

Johnson, Alvin H(arold) (b Virginia, MN, 18 April 1914; d Swarthmore, PA, 17 March 2000). American musicologist. He took the BA at the University of Minnesota (1936) and the PhD at Yale University (1954). He taught at Yale from 1950 to 1960, when he was appointed associate professor at Ohio State University. In 1961 he was made associate professor at the University of Pennsylvania. He served the American Musicological Society as treasurer from 1971 and executive director from 1978, and continued in these two offices even after his retirement from the University of Pennsylvania, finally leaving the positions for health reasons in 1993. Johnson specialized in Renaissance music, in particular the sacred works of Cipriano de Rore. His dissertation on Rore's liturgical music stresses that the Flemish tradition in which Rore wrote for the Church was the background for his contribution to the development of the madrigal. Johnson was also co-author of The Art of Music (1960), a textbook on the history of musical styles which attempts to show developing musical trends in their cultural contexts.

PAULA MORGAN

Johnson, A(rtemas) N(ixon) (b Middlebury, VT, 22 June 1817; d New Milford, CT, 1 Jan 1892). American music educationist, editor and composer. After study in Boston with George Webb and Lowell Mason, Johnson taught for the Musical Education Society (1837–41), Boston Public Schools (1839–54) and Boston Academy of Music (1844–9). He was choir leader and organist for the Park Street Church (1840–*c*1856). Among his early private students were George F. Root and Isaac B. Woodbury. After studying in Frankfurt under the composer-theorist Xaver Schnyder von Wartensee, Johnson published Instructions in Thorough Base in 1844. It established him as the nation's first professional music theorist. He subsequently founded the (Boston) Musical Gazette (1846–50), a music book publishing business favouring works by Americans (1851–6), and with B.F. Baker, the Boston Musical Journal (1853–4), which in 1855 Johnson re-established as the Massachusetts Musical Journal, making his protégé Eben Tourjée editor and publisher.

Johnson invented a learning-by-doing approach to music teaching. Nationally known as 'Johnson's System', its choral version rivalled Mason's European-based 'Pestalozzian' system. Ultimately, Johnson's American bias led to his rejection by the nation's European-influenced musical establishment. Undaunted, he found acceptance outside East Coast cities. As president of the Allegany Academy of Music in Friendship, New York (*c*1863–70), he employed the conservatory system, as also later when establishing nine music schools in New York, Ohio, Indiana and Pennsylvania (1870–88). With Johnson's encouragement, Theodore Presser, a former student and instructor at Johnson's Miami Conservatory of Music in Xenia, Ohio, founded the Music Teachers National Association, assisted by another former pupil of Johnson's, William H. Dana.

Johnson produced 36 music books, two pasticcio cantatas, and about 500 compositions, mostly tunes, anthems and gospel music.

JACKLIN BOLTON STOPP

Johnson, Bengt Emil (b Saxdalen, 12 Dec 1936). Swedish composer, poet and journal editor. He studied the piano and composition privately with Wiggen, but is mainly self-taught as a composer. In 1966 he joined the music department of Swedish radio and became the programme director of the central department in 1979. He was editor of Nutida musik from 1967–1977. At the beginning of the 1960s he wrote a few piano pieces, including a Sonata for Pianist (1961), but most of his work has been in sound poetry in the concretist spirit, from the late 1970s often in close co-operation with his wife, the singer Kerstin Ståhl, as inspiration and interpreter. He experimented first with associative 'wordscapes', in which rhythmic and phonetic patterns were controlled by numerical systems, and went on to produce concrete poems and 'text-sound compositions'. These latter pieces, the first of which was written in 1964, use multiple planes and electronic modification with the aim of bringing the listener into a more physical contact with the material.

ROLF HAGLUND

Johnson, Blind Willie (b Marlin, TX, *c*1902; d Beaumont, TX, *c*1950). American gospel singer and guitarist. Blinded at the age of seven, he learned to play guitar and accompanied himself when singing at Baptist Association meetings and in country churches around Hearne, Texas. He was married at the age of 25, and thereafter was led by his wife Angeline, who accompanied him on several recordings made on location between 1927 and 1930. Johnson possessed a remarkably deep voice, melodious yet with a pronounced rasp, as exemplified in his extraordinary narrative of Samson and Delilah, If I had my way I'd tear that building down (1927, Col. 14343). His guitar playing was unique, with a pronounced emphasis on rhythm on the majority of his 30 recordings; he also had a sensitive slide technique, as in the 'spiritual moaning' on Dark was the night, cold was the ground (1927, Col. 14303) and Bye and bye I'm going to see the King (1929, Col. 14504). Angeline Johnson sang antiphonally to his leads on several recordings, including The rain don't fall on me (1930, Col. 14537) and Church I'm fully saved today (1930, Col. 14582). Johnson's recordings were of exceptionally high quality and exercised a strong influence on other black American gospel singers. After the Depression he did not record again but continued to beg as a street singer, dying of pneumonia contracted after a house fire.

PAUL OLIVER

Johnson, Bunk [Willie Gary] (b New Orleans, 27 Dec ?1879; d New Iberia, LA, 7 July 1949). American jazz trumpeter, cornettist and bandleader. He claimed to have been born in 1879 and, despite research suggesting that it might have been ten years later, the evidence of contemporary musicians suggests that the earlier date is true. He was probably active as a musician before 1900 and it is likely that he was a casual member of one of Buddy Bolden's bands. He also worked with the Eagle and Superior Bands and paraded with Henry Allen's Brass Band. However, the majority of his career was spent outside New Orleans touring with theatre, minstrel and circus bands. He moved to New Iberia, Louisiana, in 1931 and joined the Banner Band, but gave up playing in 1935 after his teeth decayed. In 1938 Johnson was rediscovered by William Russell (ii); equipped with a new set of teeth and trumpet, he recorded in New Orleans in June 1942 with George Lewis and Jim Robinson. During the period 1943–4 he performed with members of Lu Watters's Yerba Buena Band in San Francisco. In New Orleans he recorded for the American Music label in 1944 and worked with Sidney Bechet at the Savoy Café in Boston the following year. After further American Music sessions in New Orleans, his band opened at the Stuyvesant Casino in New York (1945–6). He recorded with Don Ewell in 1946 and toured with him in the spring of 1947. Having moved to New York in October, he appeared at the Caravan Ballroom and recorded in December. Returning to New Iberia he occasionally played with local bands, but suffered two strokes in November 1948 and died the following July.

Johnson was remembered for his beautiful tone and relaxed delivery. While some of this is evident in his later work, alcoholism caused much of his output to be uneven. His first recording (1942, GTJ) was probably his most exciting, showing zest and enthusiasm for his comeback. But by 1944 his lip had improved and Tiger Rag, Panama and There's Yes, Yes in your Eyes (all AM) show him at his most inventive. However, he had to wait until his last session (1947, Del.) to record some of Joplin's rags as he had always wanted.

MIKE HAZELDINE

Johnson, Charles L(eslie) (b Kansas City, KS, 3 Dec 1876; d Kansas City, MO, 28 Dec 1950). American ragtime pianist and composer. He studied the piano, harmony and theory in the public schools and taught himself to play the banjo, guitar, mandolin and violin. For about 20 years he worked as a pianist in orchestras, hotels and theatres in Kansas City before obtaining employment as a song and piano demonstrator for J.W. Jenkins' Sons Music Company in about 1899. He also worked for the music publisher Carl Hoffman for several years. He founded his own publishing company in about 1907 and published his own works as well as the music of several local songwriters.

Johnson wrote 32 piano rags, beginning with Scandalous Thompson in 1899; most consist of three simple themes voiced in thin textures. His most popular piece was Dill Pickles (1906), which is built around a catchy three-note motif. It became one of the most successful ragtime compositions, appearing 31 times on 78 r.p.m. recordings alone, and entered the aural tradition of country, string-band and bluegrass music. His Iola (1906) helped create a fashion for 'Indian intermezzi' – piano pieces that supposedly evoked American Indian culture; words were later added, and the piece eventually sold more than 1,200,000 copies. Several of Johnson's rags became popular during the ragtime revival of the 1970s and 80s. In 1919 he wrote the successful song, Sweet and Low, but by the 1920s he devoted most of his time to arranging the works of other composers. He issued most of his compositions under his own name, but also used the pseudonyms Raymond Birch, Ethel Earnist, Herbert Leslie and Fannie B. Woods.

JOHN EDWARD HASSE

Johnson, David (Charles) (b Edinburgh, 27 Oct 1942). Scottish composer and musicologist. He was educated at Aberdeen University and at Cambridge, where he wrote his doctoral dissertation published as Music and Society in Lowland Scotland in the 18th Century (London, 1972). This was subsequently followed by Scottish Fiddle Music in the 18th Century (Edinburgh, 1984, 2/1997). As an editor, he has rediscovered and published the music of 18th-century Scottish composers such as the Earl of Kelly and McGibbon.

Compositionally, Johnson has evolved a pungent, tonal idiom influenced by Vaughan Williams, Weill, Hindemith, Britten and the Beatles, as well as the songs of Robert Burns. He has succeeded in writing genuinely humorous music, and deploys a variation technique which is at once simple and sophisticated. His most significant operatic work, Thomas the Rhymer (1976), was successfully staged in Edinburgh by a company which he formed and led. Both plot and music derive from a Scottish border ballad collected by Walter Scott. Johnson's aim to put observed social reality into music and to explain the past in present-day terms achieves an eerily ironic double-focus by the subtle use of anachronism. Much of the rich instrumental output has been written for particular performers: the Serenade for four trumpets (1987) and Dawn Call (1991) for John Wallace; the Piano Trio (1986) for the Mondrian Trio of Edinburgh; the 12 Preludes and Fugues (1995) initially for Ronald Stevenson. All these, and the sequence of sonatas for trumpet, violin and cello, all with piano, are sturdy, well crafted and have a distinct 'Scottish' flavour without being parochial. They make no large gestures, and are approachable by youthful and amateur performers; but they are also highly personal and emotionally affecting, and tread what Nigel Osborne has called 'the path of modesty and truth'.

NEIL MACKAY

Johnson, Edward (i) (fl 1572–1601). English composer. He was employed as a musician by the Kytson family at Hengrave Hall in Suffolk by 1572 and was still there in 1575 when he took part in the lavish entertainment that the Earl of Leicester mounted at Kenilworth for Queen Elizabeth; he received his expenses for this from the Kytson household. There is documentary evidence that he remained at Hengrave Hall for some years afterwards; in 1588 Sir Thomas Kytson granted Johnson and his wife Rose a 'mancion house' and land nearby for 21 years. Two songs of his survive from another entertainment (emulating Kenilworth) put on for the queen by Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford, at Elvetham, Hampshire, in 1591. In 1594 Johnson received the MusB from Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, after stating that he had been a student and practitioner of music for many years, undertaking to write a 'canticum components cantandum' and asking to be examined by John Bull and Thomas Dallis. The timing of Johnson's degree, after over 20 years in the profession, and his fulsome praise of Elizabeth throughout the Hymnus that survives from his exercise (the text is preserved in a printed broadside), may imply an attempt to succeed the royal lutenist John Johnson, who died that year. Dowland also sought the post, but it was not filled until Edward Collard was appointed in 1598. Edward Johnson and John Wilbye, his successor at Hengrave, were deponents in a lawsuit in 1601 over Dowland's Second Booke, giving their address as Clerkenwell, where the Kytsons had a London house. The following year both musicians were provided with mourning cloth for Sir Thomas's funeral.

Several writers on music praised a Johnson (with no first name), but Francis Meres, in his Palladis Tamia (London, 1598), mentioned Edward in a list of England's leading composers. An elaborate setting of 'Jhonsons Medley' is ascribed to Edward in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, as are a pavan-galliard pair 'sett by William Byrd'. 'Iohnsons Medley' is specified for one of the 'ditties' in Anthony Munday's Banquet of Daintie Conceits (London, 1588) and the same music was used for a song, The flaming fire, found in some early 17th-century Scottish manuscripts (GB-En Panmure 11, Eu La.III.488, Lbl Add.36484; ed. in MB, xv, 1957).

Five-part versions of the two Elvetham songs survive, for one or more voices and instruments. They were originally sung 'with the musicke of an exquisite consort; wherein was the lute, bandora, base-violl, citterne, treble-violl, and flute'; the first, Eliza is the fayrest quene, so delighted Elizabeth 'that shee commanded to heare it sung and to be danced three times over'. There are two pavans of Johnson's for instrumental ensemble in continental collections. Also in manuscript is a three-part song. 'Ah, sillie John', while his published vocal music comprises three four-part settings for East's metrical psalter of 1592 and a single contribution to The Triumphes of Oriana (1601), a madrigal that is notable for its puzzling poem referring to the mysterious royal favourite, Bonny-Boots, its possible allusion to Byrd, and its modification of the final couplet, common to most pieces in the collection, to 'Then sang the woodborn minstrel of Diana: Long live fair Oriana'.

DAVID BROWN/IAN HARWOOD

Johnson, Edward (ii) [Di Giovanni, Edoardo] (b Guelph, ON, 22 Aug 1878; d Guelph, 20 April 1959). Canadian tenor and impresario. His father hoped he would become a lawyer, but in 1899 he took his savings and went to New York to study music. In 1902 he was the hero in De Koven's Maid Marian in Boston, and he starred on Broadway (1908) in Oscar Straus's A Waltz Dream. On Caruso's advice he went to Florence (1909) to work with Vincenzo Lombardi. As Edoardo di Giovanni he made his operatic début in Padua (1912) in Andrea Chénier, and sang in many Italian premières, including Parsifal in Italian (his La Scala début, 1914), Puccini's Il tabarro and Gianni Schicchi (1919, Rome), and works by Pizzetti and Alfano.

Johnson left Italy to become the leading tenor of the Chicago Opera (1919–22) and the Metropolitan Opera (1922–35) where he was a favourite as Pelléas, Romeo and Peter Ibbetson, a role he created in the Deems Taylor opera. Also in his repertory were Siegfried and Faust (1923, Covent Garden). His musicianship, romantic appearance and ability to project a character were coupled with a lyric voice of good quality and range, a sound technique and a seldom-used but easy high E. He followed Herbert Witherspoon, Gatti-Casazza's successor, as general manager of the Metropolitan (1935–50), instituted the Auditions of the Air and successfully guided the Metropolitan through the war period. On retirement (1950) Johnson moved to Guelph, but remained chairman of the board of Toronto's Royal Conservatory of Music. He held honours from many countries, but was especially proud that a Guelph school and a music foundation bore his name.

RUBY MERCER

Johnson, Frank [Francis] (b ?Martinique, 1792; d Philadelphia, 6 April 1844). American composer and bandmaster. He is reputed to have settled in Philadelphia in 1809, where he won recognition as a bandmaster, composer and performer on the keyed bugle. Later his band, which was employed by élite military companies of the city, and his dance orchestra gained a national reputation; in 1837 the band became the first such American group to give concerts in England, reputedly including a command performance for Queen Victoria. When he returned to the USA in 1838 Johnson introduced Philippe Musard's concept of the 'promenade concert' to the American public. His band toured widely, playing promenade concerts chiefly consisting of Johnson's own compositions; it also shared the concert stage in Philadelphia with eminent white artists, which was unprecedented for a black group at that time.

Johnson wrote in the conventional style and forms of his time, but according to contemporary reports the performance practices of his band were most original. His 'remarkable taste in distorting a sentimental, simple and beautiful song into a reel, jig or country dance' contributed to the band's wide popularity (Waln, in Southern: Readings, p.124). An added novelty was the bandsmen's custom of singing as they played. Johnson's output of more than 300 pieces includes piano arrangements of the music played by his band, salon music, marches, quadrilles, other dances and sentimental ballads.

Johnson, Graham (Rhodes) (b Bulawayo, 10 July 1950). British pianist and writer of Rhodesian birth. He studied at the RAM with Harry Isaacs and John Streets, specializing in accompaniment and working subsequently with Gerald Moore, Geoffrey Parsons, Bernac and Britten. He made his début at the Wigmore Hall, London, in 1972 and in the same year played for Peter Pears's masterclasses at Snape. Tours in Europe with Elisabeth Schwarzkopf and in the USA with Victoria de los Angeles brought him to international notice, but already, with the foundation in 1976 of the SONGMAKERS' ALMANAC, he had established the style and line of interest that were to characterize the special achievements of his career. The Almanac, consisting originally of four singers with Johnson as organizer and accompanist, produced programmes of unusual interest, both in freshness of material and ingenuity of construction. He also developed a close relationship with the Hyperion record company, for whom he has compiled a complete Schubert song edition, begun in 1987, with a large range of carefully chosen singers and distinguished both by his discerning accompaniments and his introductions to each volume, which go far beyond the scope of most CD booklet notes. In these, and in his recorded editions of Schumann and French song, he has made a major contribution to scholarship. He was made an OBE in 1994.

Johnson, Hall (b Athens, GA, 12 March 1888; d New York, 30 April 1970). American choral director and composer. He received his first music degree from the University of Pennsylvania in 1910 and studied further at the Juilliard School and the University of Southern California. In 1934 he received an honorary DMus from the Philadelphia Music Academy. Johnson began his career as a violinist and violist, but turned to choral conducting in 1925 and organized the Hall Johnson Choir, which became famous. The most notable appearances of the choir were in the stage and film productions of The Green Pastures, in the film Lost Horizon, and at the 1951 International Festival of Fine Arts in Berlin.

Johnson's principal works are the folk drama Run Little Chillun (1933), the cantata Son of Man (1946), the operetta Fi-Yer, several art songs and many spirituals arranged for solo voice or chorus.

Johnson, Hunter (b Benson, NC, 14 April 1906; d Smithfield, NC, 27 Aug 1998). American composer and teacher. He studied at the University of North Carolina (1924–6) and at the Eastman School (1929). Appointments followed as a teacher of composition at the University of Michigan (1929–33), the University of Manitoba (1944–7), Cornell University (1948–53), the University of Illinois (1959–65) and the University of Texas (1966–71). His honours include a Rome Prize (1933), Guggenheim Fellowships (1941, 1954), an award from the National Institute of Arts and Letters and the Fine Arts Award of North Carolina (1965). As a composer Johnson has used established materials in an individual way, integrating elements of jazz into his style. His musical language is closely related to that of Ives and Copland, but there is an intensity in his best works that creates a very individual style, evident in Letter to the World, a ballet commissioned by Martha Graham, and in the Piano Sonata, which has found a lasting place in the repertory. The Scarlet Letter, written in 1975, was the result of another Graham commission.

RICHARD A. MONACO/MICHAEL MECKNA

Johnson, James (b Ettrick Valley, *c*1750; d Edinburgh, 26 Feb 1811). Scottish music engraver. He was a leading Edinburgh engraver, who from 1772 to 1790 prepared plates for well over half the music issued in Scotland. The son of Charles Johnson, he was probably apprenticed with James Reed, an early Edinburgh music engraver. Johnson's first known work is Domenico Corri's Six Canzones for Two Voices (1772); then followed A Collection of Favourite Scots Tunes ... by the Late Mr Chs McLean and other Eminent Masters (*c*1772) and Daniel Dow's Twenty Minuets (1773). These were cut in copper, but his later work is all stamped on pewter, a practice which his Scots Magazine obituary notice erroneously credits him with having invented.

Johnson worked mostly for other Scottish publishers, but he is remembered for the songbook The Scots Musical Museum, which he published himself in six volumes (1787–1803). The first volume is not particularly noteworthy, but in 1787 Johnson met Robert Burns and persuaded him to help with the editing. The subsequent volumes contain the bulk of Burns's work on Scottish folksong, including collecting, editing, rewriting and restoring; the collection, which contains 600 songs, has become a classic of its kind. Stephen and William Clarke supplied bass lines with figures and William Stenhouse wrote a series of scholarly notes on each song between 1817 and 1820.

About 1790 Johnson opened a music shop in the Lawnmarket, where his firm remained as Johnson & Co. until his death. He took his apprentice John Anderson into partnership about 1811; Anderson continued with Johnson's widow as Johnson & Anderson at 475 High Street (1811–12) and at North Gray's Close (1812–15). The firm appears to have ceased business in 1815.

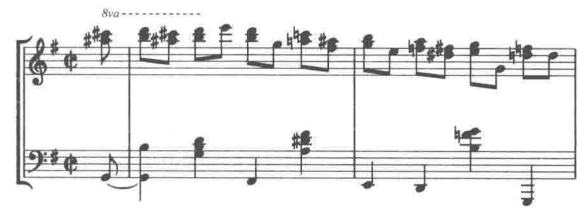
FRANK KIDSON/WILLIAM C. SMITH/DAVID JOHNSON

Johnson, James P(rice) (b New Brunswick, NJ, 1 Feb 1894; d New York, 17 Nov 1955). American jazz and musical theatre pianist and composer. He first learnt music from his mother, singing songs at the piano. In 1908 the family settled in New York, where Johnson took lessons with Bruto Giannini, and also learnt from such contemporary ragtime pianists as Eubie Blake. By 1913 he had begun to work at clubs in the black section of Hell's Kitchen in New York known as 'The Jungles', where labourers from the South danced most of the night to the accompaniment of solo piano. It was in these dance halls that Johnson developed many of the rhythmically driving shout pieces for which he later became famous. In 1917 he published the first of some 200 songs and recorded his earliest piano rolls.



Johnson recorded a series of inspired solo performances in the 1920s of his own compositions, beginning with Carolina Shout (1921, OK; his best-known work for piano), Keep off the Grass (1921, OK) and The Harlem Strut (1922, Black Swan), and culminating in 1930 with Jingles and You've Got to be Modernistic (1930, Bruns.). He played virtuoso pieces of this sort in competitive cutting contests with his contemporaries, and he soon came to be regarded as the best of the Harlem pianists. He recorded with many blues singers of the day, notably Bessie Smith and Ethel Waters. In 1923 Johnson wrote his first Broadway musical, Runnin' Wild, which ran for 213 performances; its score included what came to be the defining song of America's jazz age, The Charleston. He continued, with mixed success, to write for the Broadway stage throughout his career, producing more than a dozen scores. At the same time he began composing large-scale orchestral works based loosely on classical models and incorporating elements of jazz. The first of these, Yamekraw, a piano rhapsody, was orchestrated by William Grant Still and was performed in Carnegie Hall in 1927 with Fats Waller as soloist. The following year Waller and Johnson collaborated on the revue Keep Shufflin', each man composing different songs. They also performed on two pianos for the show. During the Depression Johnson turned his attention increasingly to the composition of large-scale works. He wrote his Harlem Symphony in 1932, followed by a piano concerto, Jassamine, in 1934 and Symphony in Brown in 1935; De Organizer, a one-act 'blues opera' with a libretto by Langston Hughes, received one performance at Carnegie Hall in 1940. A true assessment of this music is hampered by the loss of many of the scores, but some commentators have questioned the success of Johnson's orchestral compositions.

With the revival of traditional jazz in the late 1930s and 40s, Johnson began again to appear frequently in clubs and concerts, and to take part in recording sessions. He suffered several minor strokes in the 1940s, and a major one in 1951 which left him incapacitated until his death.

Despite his great versatility, Johnson's main contribution was as a jazz pianist. He perfected the style known as stride piano, which infused the Midwestern ragtime of Scott Joplin and his contemporaries with elements of jazz, blues and popular song, as well as greatly increasing the demands on the pianist. Johnson's stride pieces share with ragtime a more or less composed, multi-strain format and an oom-pah bass figure. However, he often makes use of broken 10ths, instead of the traditional octaves of ragtime, and other deviations in the left hand, while his right-hand patterns depart from the stereotyped syncopations and broken chord melodies of ragtime (both of these features are evident in Carolina Shout, ex.1). Furthermore, he never repeats strains without varying them. Perhaps most importantly, the rhythmic feel of his style is more relaxed and closer to the swing of jazz than to the even quavers of ragtime. At the same time he generates more rhythmic intensity by using shifts of register, riffs and blues-like clusters in the treble to imitate the call-and-response patterns of black church music. It is this rhythmicization of his musical ideas that, by allowing for variation and improvisation, lies at the heart of the new freedom of his style. Thus, like his New Orleans contemporary Jelly Roll Morton, Johnson developed a viable jazz piano style by fusing the diverse musical influences of his youth. He exercised a major influence on succeeding generations of jazz pianists, from his friend and pupil Fats Waller through Count Basie, Duke Ellington, Art Tatum and Teddy Wilson to modern players such as Erroll Garner, Jaki Byard and Thelonious Monk.

WILLA ROUDER

Johnson, J.J. [James Louis] (b Indianapolis, 22 Jan 1924). American jazz trombonist and composer. He studied the piano between the ages of nine and eleven with a church organist, and took up the trombone when he was 14. In 1941–2 he toured with bands led by Clarence Love and Isaac Snookum Russell, whose trumpeter Fats Navarro had a strong impact on Johnson's playing. He then began an important engagement with Benny Carter's orchestra (1942–5), touring the USA, writing a few arrangements and making numerous radio broadcasts and transcriptions. His earliest recorded solo was on Love for Sale (1943, Cap.) and he appeared at the first Jazz at the Philharmonic concert (1944).

By May 1945 Johnson was with the Count Basie Orchestra, mostly in New York. He moved permanently to New York in mid-1946, and for the next few years played small-group jazz at various clubs with Bud Powell, Max Roach, Miles Davis, Navarro, Charlie Parker, Dizzy Gillespie and others, becoming increasingly absorbed in the new bop style. In 1951 he toured Korea, Japan and the South Pacific for the United Service Organizations in a band under Oscar Pettiford, and during 1952 he toured with an all-star group that included Davis. However, his worsening financial situation forced him to retire from music in August 1952; he worked as a blueprint inspector at the Sperry Gyroscope Company, and performed only sporadically.

Then, in August 1954, Johnson formed a highly successful trombone duo with Kai Winding. Their group, called Jay and Kai, remained intact until 1956, bringing Johnson's work to a larger audience and establishing his reputation as the leading black American jazz trombonist. His Poem for Brass (also known as Jazz Suite for Brass), recorded for Columbia in 1956, drew attention to his talents as a composer: many of his skilfully orchestrated works employ fugal passages and out-of-tempo chorales as well as more conventional jazz swing sections.

After disbanding Jay and Kai, Johnson led his own quintet until summer 1960, touring Europe and composing large-scale works such as El camino real and Sketch for Trombone and Band, which were first performed at the Monterey Jazz Festival in 1959. He taught at the Lenox School of Jazz in summer 1960, and in the following year wrote a new major work, Perceptions, for Gillespie.

Johnson continued to combine careers as a performer and composer throughout the 1960s. He played with Davis's group (1961–2), formed a new quartet of his own (1963) and led a sextet, which included Clark Terry and Sonny Stitt, on a tour of Japan (1964). By 1967 he was staff composer and conductor for MBA Music in New York. From 1970, when he moved to Los Angeles, he primarily wrote scores for television and films; his infrequent recordings and performances, however, invariably re-established his pre-eminence among jazz trombonists. In 1987 he returned to Indianapolis and became more active as a player.

Johnson is the most important postwar jazz trombonist and a major influence on all players of the instrument. His earliest recorded solos up to 1945 reveal a thick tone, aggressive manner and impressive mobility. They are not yet far removed, though, from the solos of his early influences – Lester Young, Roy Eldridge and the trombonist Fred Beckett, who emphasized the linear qualities of the instrument rather than the effects of the slide.

During the 1940s Johnson developed such an astounding technical facility that some record reviewers insisted, erroneously, that he played a valve trombone; the speed of his playing and the clarity and accuracy he achieved at fast tempos have never been surpassed. In 1947 he began to play with a lighter tone (occasionally enhanced by a felt mute) and reserved vibrato for special effects. The result was a rather dry but attractive sound resembling that of a french horn. Johnson also worked diligently at this period to adapt bop patterns to the trombone, and his solos suffer from an emphasis on speed and an overreliance on memorized formulas incorporating such bop trademarks as the flattened 5th. His performances on both versions of Crazeology with Charlie Parker (1947, Dial) begin with the same phrase and contain other whole phrases in common. The same is true of the two renditions of Johnson's celebrated solo on Blue Mode (1949, NewJ), despite their very different tempos.

During the late 1950s Johnson's playing matured: he relied less on formulas and speed, and more on a scalar approach and motivic development. Recordings of live performances dating from this time provide examples of brilliant developmental sequences that were delivered with powerful emotion. The features of Johnson's mature style are well illustrated in ex.1 (from Mack the Knife, 1961, Col.), where the opening phrase is a rhythmicized version of Kurt Weill's theme and the rest of the chorus is built in the modal manner from a single scale, connecting without a break to the next chorus.

Johnson, John (i) (fl 1579–94). English lutenist and composer, father of ROBERT JOHNSON (ii). He was appointed 'one of the musicians for the three lutes at 20 li[vres] a year' to Queen Elizabeth in 1579. He may have been the 'Jonsonum' included in John Case's Apologia musices (Oxford, 1588) in the list of great English musicians of the time (p.44). Ballads published in 1588 were to be sung to two of Johnson's most admired pieces, The Medley and the Flat pavan, proving that these pieces had been in circulation long enough for the poet to assume that the ballad-singing public was acquainted with them. Johnson's ability as a musician was appreciated at court, as is shown by the 50-year lease granted in reversion in 1595 'to Alice, widow of John Johnson, one of the Queens musicians for the lute' of Cranborne Manor in Dorset and of lands in Cornwall, Lincoln, Staffordshire, Wiltshire and Flint 'in consideration of her husband's services'.

Johnson's compositions are widely disseminated in both English and continental sources. The popularity of his music is reflected in the many rearrangements of his works by contemporaries and near contemporaries. Indeed it is often difficult to distinguish between Johnson's own work and that of other composers. Even his contemporaries sometimes mistook his music for someone else's; witness the ascription of A pavane to delight to 'Ed. Jhonson' in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, to 'Richard Jhonson' in one of the Walsingham partbooks and to 'Jhon Johnsonne' in other sources. Johnson's style is an amalgam of native and foreign (especially Italian) elements. His works show the English taste for cross-relations, surprising harmonic and tonal relationships and, above all, variation. Indeed, without exception, all his compositions include some form of variation procedure and often more than one kind at a time; variation techniques range from an entire piece being based on a single motif, to the varied reprise, to discanting on English and Italian grounds, to variations of popular tunes such as Walsingham and Carman's Whistle. He is now best known, especially among lutenists, for his treble variations of grounds and duets for equal lutes. The latter combine the tripartite dance with varied reprise and role exchange, each lutenist performing the secondo part against the other's primo, a novel procedure at this time. 18 trebles to grounds are ascribed to Johnson, most if not all dating from the late 1570s and early 1580s. They belong to an old-fashioned kind of music that is far removed in spirit and style from his pavans and galliards which are much more complex and are technically more demanding.

CHARLES EDWARD McGUIRE

Johnson, John (ii) (fl 1740–62). English music publisher, printer, music seller and possibly violin maker. He began his business in London by 1740, and probably acquired part of those of DANIEL WRIGHT and BENJAMIN COOKE (i), some of whose publications he reissued from the original plates. Around the mid-18th century the predominance of the Walsh engraving and publishing business began to wane, and Johnson was responsible for publishing some of the best music of the day, including works by Arne, Felton, Geminiani, Nares, Domenico Scarlatti and Stanley, as well as annual volumes and large collections of country dances. Unusually, many of Johnson's editions bore dates; their technical quality was high, some being engraved by John Phillips. A number of fair-quality violins bear the Johnson label, most probably made for rather than actually by him.

Johnson appears to have died about 1762, and from that time to 1777 most of the imprints bear the name of 'Mrs. Johnson' or 'R. Johnson', presumably his widow. The old imprint 'John Johnson' occasionally appears in these years, and may refer to her late husband or to another relative. Johnson's sign from 1748, 'The Harp and Crown', is absent from these imprints, having been adopted by J. Longman & Co. when it started business about 1767. Mrs Johnson died in 1777, and in November that year ROBERT BREMNER announced the purchase of most of her stock and plates.

FRANK KIDSON/WILLIAM C. SMITH/PETER WARD JONES

Johnson, J(ohn) Rosamond (b Jacksonville, FL, 11 Aug 1873; d New York, 11 Nov 1954). American singer, composer, arranger and conductor. He studied singing and the piano at the New England Conservatory in 1893, and in 1896 appeared with John Isham's concert company, Oriental America, whose repertory consisted of solos and ensembles from serious and light opera. He returned to Florida to teach but, attracted by New York theatre, moved north again in 1899 with his brother James Weldon Johnson. He then met Robert 'Bob' Cole, a fellow Southerner and experienced vaudevillian with whom he developed an original and suave vaudeville act: both sang and Johnson accompanied at the piano.

Within two years of meeting, Cole and the Johnson brothers had become one of the most financially successful songwriting partnerships of the era. They maintained a close creative relationship and cultivated influential performers (May Irwin, Marie Cahill and Peter Dailey), publishers (J.W. Stern and E.B. Marks) and producers (Klaw and Erlanger) who could deliver their songs to large audiences. Not limited to the ragtime or coon song clichés expected of black Tin Pan Alley composers, their pieces were used in many large shows without other black American participants, such as The Belle of Bridgeport (1900) and Mother Goose (1903). They composed most of the music for Humpty Dumpty (1904) and In Newport (1904) before writing, directing and performing in The Shoo-Fly Regiment (1907) and The Red Moon (1909), both with all-black casts. Hampered by segregated accommodation and bookings in second-class theatres, these shows were unsuccessful on tour. Cole and Johnson subsequently returned to vaudeville, playing on the Keith circuit until Cole's death in 1911.

Johnson briefly formed acts with other partners, then took up the musical leadership of Hammerstein's London Opera House (1913) and the directorship of the Music School Settlement for Colored People in Harlem (1914–19). Continuing to arrange, compose, direct and perform as both singer and actor in the USA and abroad, in the 1920s he formed the Inimitable Five and Johnson and Company, and performed duets with Taylor Gordon in spirituals concerts. He wrote music for Bert Williams's show Mr Lode of Koal (1909), the London revue Come Over Here (1913) and the New York revues Fast and Furious (1931) and Harlem Rounders (1925), and also appeared in the first cast of Porgy and Bess as Lawyer Frazier (1935) and in Cabin in the Sky as Brother Green (1940).

Johnson brought substantial knowledge of operetta, especially its rich harmonic language, flowing lines and sense of form, to his popular songwriting. He blended the swaying rhythms of ragtime with catchy melodies and generally inoffensive, though often dialect-filled, texts in the best-selling titles: among others, these included Under the Bamboo Tree, Congo Love Song and My Castle on the Nile. His mastery of popular idioms, familiarity with classical models and interest in varieties of black music is demonstrated in his six-song cycle, The Evolution of Ragtime, a quasi-historical overview from the 'primitive' to the modern. He edited four collections of black American music: The Book of American Negro Spirituals (New York, 1925/R), The Second Book of American Spirituals (New York, 1926/R), Shout Songs (1936) and Rolling Along in Song (New York, 1937). The first two were collaborations with his brother, as was the well-known hymn-anthem Lift Every voice and sing (1901).

Johnson, Lockrem (b Davenport, IA, 15 March 1924; d Seattle, 5 March 1977). American composer, music publisher and pianist. He studied composition with George McKay at the University of Washington (1938–42) and after military service joined the faculty there to teach piano and theory (1947–9). He was music director of the Eleanor King Dance Company (1947–50) and the pianist of the Seattle SO (1948–51); during these years he performed extensively throughout the Pacific Northwest in chamber ensembles and as a soloist.

In 1951 Johnson moved to New York, where he worked in the music publishing business as education director for Mercury Music (1951–4), head of the orchestral department at C.F. Peters (1954–8) and president of Dow Publishers (1957–62). After returning to Seattle, he served at the helm of the Cornish School of Music (1962–9) and in 1970 founded Puget Music Publications, a firm devoted to the publication of works by composers of the Pacific Northwest.

An active composer throughout his career, Johnson wrote chiefly chamber and piano compositions in a lyrical and dramatic style. A number of his works were quite successful during his lifetime; his one-act chamber opera A Letter to Emily, based on an incident in the life of Emily Dickinson, was staged nearly 50 times during the decade following its composition (1951). He received numerous commissions, as well as a Guggenheim Fellowship (1952) and two MacDowell Colony Fellowships (1956, 1965). He contributed many articles to the Piano Quarterly, the American Composers Alliance Bulletin and other periodicals.

Johnson, Lonnie [Alonzo] (b New Orleans, 8 Feb 1889; d Toronto, ON, 16 June 1970). American blues singer and guitarist. The son of a musician and a member of a large, musical African American family, he started playing the guitar and violin professionally in Storyville, New Orleans, while in his teens. By 1917 he was working with Charlie Creath's Jazz-o-Maniacs on the St Paul riverboat, and later he joined Fate Marable's riverboat band. He toured the South with Bessie Smith in 1929 and had his own radio show in New York in 1929–30. From 1937 to 1940 he worked with Baby Dodds at the Three Deuces club in Chicago. Late in life he travelled to Europe with the American Folk Blues Festival (1963), and from 1965 he performed regularly in Toronto.

Johnson played brilliantly on such solos as Stomping 'em Along Slow (1928, OK) and in duets with Eddie Lang, for example A Handful of Riffs (1929, OK). He was unique among blues performers in working with jazz musicians, and he recorded with Duke Ellington, Louis Armstrong and, as a member of Blind Willie Dunn's Gin Bottle Four, King Oliver. He was a sensitive accompanist, providing a sympathetic support to the irregular timing of the blues singer Alger Texas Alexander on Bell Cow Blues (1928, OK) and other titles. Johnson's own voice was reedy and rather insinuating. His lyrics were generally interesting, a typical example being Low Land Moan (1927, OK), and he had a liking for sentimental themes, such as Baby please don't leave home no more (1929, OK). He was particularly effective when singing serious blues such as Hard times ain't gone nowhere (1937, Decca).

PAUL OLIVER

Johnson, Robert (i) (b Duns, *c*1500; *d c*1560). Scottish composer. According to Thomas Wood (i)'s marginal notes in the St Andrews Psalter (IRL-Dtc, GB-Eu, Lbl, US-Wgu, copied 1566–92) he was a Scottish priest, born in Duns, was accused of heresy and fled to England long before the Scottish Reformation in 1560. Although an act of parliament had been passed in Scotland against the Lutheran heresy as early as 1525, Johnson's surviving music for the Roman rite appears on stylistic grounds to date from the 1520s and 1530s. Although all of it is extant only in English sources, Johnson could have composed some of the early items (e.g. Ave Dei Patris filia and Laudes Deo) while still in Scotland. Wood also stated that in England Johnson knew Thomas Hudson the elder, of the Hudson family of musicians from York, who entered service at the Scottish court in 1565. Johnson may have spent some time in York, perhaps on his way south in the 1530s. There is no clear contemporary evidence of his subsequent whereabouts in England, although he is described as 'peticanon of Windsor' in a late 16th-century manuscript. The charming (though totally unsubstantiated) fancy that Johnson was chaplain to Anne Boleyn probably grew out of the fact that he set a text attributed to her.

Johnson's early Ave Dei Patris filia for five voices is a large-scale votive antiphon cast in a traditional mould: a sequence of well-defined sections for three, four and five voices in a mixture of free and imitative counterpoint, characteristic of British sacred music of the 1520s. Some of these sections were later often listed as separate items, and have since been erroneously referred to as individual works. Laudes Deo is an extended and luxuriantly decorative setting for two voices of a troped lesson for Christmas. The Easter verse Dicant nunc Judei, also for two voices, is shorter and much simpler in melodic outline and may be of a later date. Progressive structural imitation is a feature of this composition, as it is of the two settings for four and five voices of the Easter responsory Dum transisset Sabbatum, although here it is combined with cantus-firmus technique, producing some strong dissonances. The Matins responsory Gaude Maria Virgo for four voices (a fifth was added later in an instrumental version) shows growing assurance in the handling of imitation, and its short motivic phrases suggest the influence of the post-Josquin generation of continental composers, and a date somewhere in the 1530s.

From about 1540 in England polyphonic settings of verses from the psalms in Latin acquired something of the scope and function of the earlier votive antiphon.

Johnson's three examples in the form, Deus misereatur nostri (Psalm lxvii) for four voices and two settings of Domine in virtute tua (Psalm xxi) for five voices, are all large-scale works using consistently applied structural imitation throughout. The two settings of Domine in virtute tua are two different workings of the same (or very similar) material.

Also from the 1540s in England date the first attempts to adapt Latin compositions to English words, and to write sacred music to English texts and in a completely chordal idiom. Johnson's O eternal God, written in the four-part chordal style that was to become standard for psalm and canticle setting, almost certainly dates from the late 1540s. Perhaps contemporary with this is Benedicam Domino, a mixture of chordal writing and close imitation. Slightly later and more polyphonic in character is I geve you a new commaundement; this, together with O eternal God, was published in John Day's Certaine Notes (1565), a collection of English service music. An English version of Johnson's Deus misereatur nostri with a rhyming text (not very satisfactorily underlaid) entitled Relieve us, O Lord also appeared in Day's collection. Johnson's music for the Morning, Communion and Evening Service (Te Deum, Jubilate, Benedictus, Creed, Magnificat, Nunc dimittis) is written entirely in homophonic style and probably dates from the 1550s. O happy man, sometimes attributed to Johnson, is almost certainly by Sheppard.

Secular vocal music by Johnson includes Ty the mare tomboy, an extended song that survives only in a single part in a manuscript of Durham provenance, perhaps dating from Johnson's sojourn in the north of England about 1530. The anthem-like setting of Defiled is my name is traditionally linked with Anne Boleyn (d 1536), but musically more akin to the sacred compositions of around 1550. Com palefaced death by 'Johnson' could be a theatre piece in the newly developing consort song style of the 1560s, or it may be by a younger contemporary of the same name. Instrumental consorts by Johnson include a five-part In Nomine and a five-part piece A knell, based on an ostinato. The In Nomine, two canonic settings of O lux beata Trinitas and a fragmentary setting of O lux mundi seem to be early works; A knell appears to be a mature middle-period work.

KENNETH ELLIOTT

Johnson, Robert (ii) (b ?London, *c*1583; d London, shortly before 26 Nov 1633). English composer and lutenist, son of JOHN JOHNSON (i). On 29 March 1596 he was indentured as 'allowes or covenant servaunt', for seven years to Sir George Carey, Lord Chamberlain from that year to 1603, who undertook to have him taught music and to provide him with board, lodging and clothing. At Midsummer 1604 he was appointed lutenist to King James I at 20d a day, with £16 2s. 8d a year for livery, and he held the post until his death, his name occurring annually in the Audit Office Declared Accounts up to 1633. This post had belonged to his father, from whose death it had remained unoccupied, apart from the brief appointment of Edward Collard in 1598–9. From 1610 to 1612 Johnson held a second appointment among the musicians to Prince Henry, with a salary of £40 a year. Henry died in 1612, but the post was revived for Johnson in the years 1617–25 as musician to Prince Charles. This second royal appointment was transferred, after 1625, to the new group called the 'lutes, viols and voices' and Johnson held it too until his death.

He was included among the seven trumpeters and eight other musicians who accompanied the Earl of Hertford's embassy to Albert Archduke of Austria in 1605. He was paid arrears for three years in 1607, indicating that he was abroad for this time. In 1620 he appeared among those musicians invited to provide music for the proposed amphitheatre in London, a clear mark of distinction. When Thomas Lupo died (?Dec 1627) Johnson petitioned for his post as composer for the 'lutes and voices', but was unsuccessful. Johnson had responsibilities for distributing money for resources among the king's lutes and was regularly given payments (normally £20 p.a.) for strings from 1609. On 5 June 1611 £10 was paid to him for a lute; and from 1617 he had general responsibility for maintaining the king's lutes, a job that seems to have been transferred to John Coggeshall (d 1655) from 1629. Johnson certainly played in the consort of lutes that was maintained at the Jacobean court. In this he may well have played bass lute, as he is mentioned in one account for 10 January 1610/11 as 'musicon for the base Lute'. His will (proved 28 November 1633) indicates that he had a wife Anne, no surviving children, and lived in Acton where he had lands and tenements.

As Lord Chamberlain, Johnson's patron, Sir George Carey, was also patron of The King's Men Players, who performed masques and plays at the Globe and Blackfriars theatres. It was no doubt largely through this connection that Johnson began to be associated with the theatre from 1607 onwards. The compositions for which he is best known are the many songs he wrote for theatre productions. He was also closely connected with Ben Jonson and others in the composition, arrangement and performance of the music for a number of court masques. The accounts for Ben Jonson's Oberon (1611) record a payment made to Johnson for composing dances that were then set for violins by Thomas Lupo, while Love Freed from Ignorance and Folly (1611) included songs by Alfonso Ferrabosco (ii) set to the lute by Johnson. Among other notable works in which he collaborated were George Chapman's Memorable Masque (1613) and Thomas Campion's Lords' Masque (1613). The identification of Johnson's actual contribution to the dance music that survives from these and other masques is often problematic, though the solo lute music can provide some indicators. This type of masque dance has simple textures, memorable tunes, clear tonality and strong characterization, and was widely imitated by contemporaries. Orlando Gibbons arranged much of it for keyboard.

Johnson's songs for plays merit particular attention as important examples of the more declamatory type of ayre cultivated by a number of composers from about 1610 onwards; the style of these pieces was probably prompted by their dramatic context and by influences from Italian monody. It is significant that they do not appear in sources with a tablature accompaniment, and usually have only an unfigured bass for theorbo. Many are remarkably successful in their evocation of character and mood. Care-charming sleep from Valentinian is one of the best examples of the early declamatory style, and the profuse ornamentation, which appears in the first two of the following three known sources for the song (GB-Cfm, Lbl, Ob), plays an important affective role. Still more remarkable in its dramatic expression is Oh, let us howl from The Duchess of Malfi, and the beautiful song Away delights conveys a telling strain of Jacobean melancholy. His best-known songs are Full fathom five and Where the bee sucks from The Tempest. Several songs, among them Have you seen the bright lily grow? and Hark you ladies that despise survive anonymously but have conjecturally been attributed to Johnson.

It would appear from source evidence that Johnson's surviving lute music was written during the period 1600–15, although the masque pieces are probably arrangements, and may not even have been made by Johnson. Despite the post-1610 fashion for lighter music in the French style, Johnson could write intense, sombre lute music in a style that was removed from that of earlier Golden Age music, but which was firmly rooted in the English tradition (e.g. his fantasia and pavans). The fantasia is unlike those of Dowland, with no suggestion of virtuoso display. It achieves expression through the various workings of the opening motif and the excellent use of contrasting tessituras from the very lowest to the highest. This style was continued and developed by Cuthbert Hely and John Wilson after 1625. The almains and masque dances in common time regularly require the highest fret positions on the lute. Clearly many are arrangements of dances originally intended for a violin band or massed lutes. This type of lute piece maintained its popularity up to the mid-century. Johnson's corant has characteristics more normally associated with his almains and masque dances. Possibly it also originated from Chapman's 1613 masque, as there are two almains from the masque entitled 'The Princes' masque or almain.

Johnson is the last of the English lute composers to flourish before the adoption of the new tunings in England during the 1630s. His compositions are found in all the major lute manuscripts from the decade 1610–20 and normally require a lute with nine or ten courses in Renaissance tuning. They also appear in several sources of the preceding decade and in a few continental sources. They maintained their popularity in the period after 1630 when transitional tunings gradually became the norm. The arrangements of Johnson pieces by Richard Mathew in The Lutes Apology (1652) require a 12-course lute in the flat tuning. Non-lute sources of Johnson's music also indicate that some pieces remained popular up to the mid-century. In 1676 Mace paired Johnson and Dowland as the most remarkable of the old school.

DAVID LUMSDEN, IAN SPINK, PETER HOLMAN/ MATTHEW SPRING

Johnson, Robert (iii) [Dodds, Robert; Spencer, Robert] (b Hazlehurst, MS, 8 May 1911; d Greenwood, MS, 16 Aug 1938). American blues singer and guitarist. As a boy he travelled with his mother around plantations and labour camps playing the jew's harp and the harmonica. About 1927 he acquired a guitar. He was married in 1929 but his wife died in childbirth the following year. He then led a brief and reportedly wild adult life as a musical hobo in the South. Shortly before his apparently violent death, he made a number of excellent and highly influential recordings in San Antonio and Dallas; they characterize Mississippi blues of the mid-1930s and form the link between this tradition and modern Chicago blues. His work was influenced by Son House and recordings by the guitarist Lonnie Johnson, and clearly shows an awareness of Skip James and Hambone Willie Newbern, whose themes he adapted in 32·20 Blues (1936, Voc.) and If I had possession over Judgment Day (1936, Col.). The latter piece, not issued in his lifetime, revealed the tormented, even prophetic theme in his work that culminated in Hell Hound on my Trail (1937, Voc.). Johnson's voice was taut and often strained, and he sometimes used falsetto effectively, as on Kind Hearted Woman (1936, Voc.). His guitar playing combined dramatic rhythms with agitated whining effects produced by a bottleneck slide. The persistent walking bass rhythm in I believe I'll dust my broom and Ramblin' on my Mind (both 1936, Voc.) profoundly influenced both the postwar generation of blues singers, including Elmore James, his one-time companion Johnny Shines and his stepson Robert Lockwood jr, and those involved in the British blues-rock boom of the 1960s such as Eric Clapton and John Mayall. Alternative recording takes of his performances show that they were well-rehearsed. He performed popular songs, such as My Blue Heaven, and became a professional travelling musician in the 1930s, using Helena, Arkansas, as his home base. Johnson epitomized for white blues enthusiasts the quintessential black American blues artist, and his life and work have become a romantic legend. When his complete recordings were re-issued on two CDs in 1990 the set rapidly sold 500,000 copies, becoming the most successful blues issue to that date.

PAUL OLIVER

Johnson, Robert Sherlaw (b Sunderland, 21 May 1932). English composer and pianist. He studied at Durham University (1950–53) and at the RAM (1953–7), where his teachers included Alwyn, Bush and Ferguson (composition), and Pirani (piano). In 1957–8 he was in Paris, studying composition with Boulanger, attending some of Messiaen's classes at the Conservatoire and taking piano lessons with Février. He has held appointments as assistant lecturer at Leeds University (1961–3), as director of music at Bradford Girls' Grammar School (1963–5) and as lecturer at the universities of York (1965–70) and Oxford (1970–99). In 1969 he was one of the joint winners of the Radcliffe Music Award with his Second Quartet. He received the DMus (Leeds) in 1971, the DMus (Oxon) in 1990 and was made a FRAM in 1984.

An essential source for Johnson's activity, as composer and as pianist, has been the music of Messiaen, on which he has published a seminal study (1975, 2/1989). His performances of the solo piano music, much of which he has recorded commercially, move with keen rhythmic life through an extended range of dynamics and timbre, finely scaled to structural purpose. The same qualities animate his performances and recordings of the song cycles, given with Noelle Barker, for whom a large part of his own vocal music has been written. Messiaen's influence on Johnson's composition has been subsumed to varying degrees in different works, and combined with other interests, notably the music of Varèse, Stockhausen and Boulez. While The Resurrection of Fêng-Huang shows the influence of Messiaen's Cinq rechants, there is a definite individuality in the later piano pieces, in two works for soprano, piano and tape – The Praises of Heaven and Earth and Green Whispers of Gold – and in the tape piece Fractal Dialogue (1994). A similar fusion of the modernist strands of Messiaen and Webernian serialism is to be found in his piano works. The First Sonata is strictly serial, while in the less orthodox serialism of the Piano Sonata no.2 (in which note-rows are transposed according to cycles of 5ths or 3rds, akin to Messiaen's modes), fingers and drumsticks are used directly on the strings to produce effects which interact almost orchestrally with the conventional keyboard sounds; in the expressive Seven Short Pieces (1968) this same technique evokes the sound of the gamelan. The use of selective transposition and a fixed pitch centre provides tonal focus in Carmina vernalia (1972), its third movement centring on middle C, while the Nocturn for two pianos (1992) involves ritual interactions between the keyboard and the strings and between the instruments. His colouristic use of the piano is perhaps most eloquent in the later Pour le tombeau de Messiaen (1994), in which his notations of goldfinch and blackbird song are set against colourful harmonic backdrops. A like concern for relating diverse materials brings richness to Green Whispers of Gold, where Johnson's vocal writing is at its most characteristic in ease and floridness.

PAUL GRIFFITHS/MALCOLM MILLER

Johnson, Samuel (b Cheshire, 1691; d Gawsworth, nr Macclesfield, 3 May 1773). English eccentric, violinist and amateur composer. A Cheshire dancing-master, by 1724 he was in London working as a violinist. He became tutor to the Duke of Montague who, apparently tongue-in-cheek, persuaded him to write Hurlothrumbo, which he then extolled in London as 'the most sublime effort of human genius'. As a result it was produced at the Little Theatre in the Haymarket (29 March 1729), became the talk of London, and ran for some 30 nights. Johnson himself was Lord Flame, acting in exaggerated style with a fiddle in his hands and sometimes on stilts. The crazily fustian words had imaginative touches that left people wondering whether he was mad or inspired. One still wonders today. The inconsequential surrealist action and long nonsense names (e.g. Dologodelmo) were soon being imitated in burlesques by Fielding (The Tragedy of Tragedies, 1730) and Carey (Chrononhotonthologos, 1734). This success was never repeated in Johnson's later plays.

The music for the ten songs in Hurlothrumbo was composed by Johnson himself and published in full score. Some of the tunes are mildly pretty, and as a dancing-master Johnson knew how to write idiomatically for the violin, but his basses are incompetent. He also composed music for his All Alive and Merry, an 'Opera in a Comedy', which was produced at Lincoln's Inn Fields on 10 January 1737. It is not known what other music he wrote. When he was first in London he preferred Bononcini to Handel, 'who writes his Musick in the High-Dutch Taste', but in 1734 he wrote Handel an open letter in which, at stupefying length, the composer is tried and found guilty of writing too well. It is the longest item in Deutsch's documentary biography.

In addition to his work in London, Johnson continued as a dancing-master in Manchester. In about 1745 he retired to Gawsworth, near Macclesfield.

Johnson, Scott (Richard) (b Madison, WI, 12 May 1952). American composer and electric guitarist. He studied music and the visual arts at the University of Wisconsin (BS 1974). In 1975 he moved to New York, where he became active in the downtown music scene. He was first brought to wider attention in 1982 with his composition John Somebody, a long and exhilarating piece for sampled speaking voices and electric guitar. With this work, he became one of the first composers to incorporate elements of rock music into classical composition and the first to forge musical motifs from sampled speech. Continuing his efforts to unite the American vernacular with techniques of classical composition, he formed the amplified Scott Johnson Ensemble, a group consisting of three saxophonists, two electric guitarists, an electric bass guitarist and two percussionists. One of his works from this period, Simple Engines (1986), expands a six-note riff from a James Brown song into a 12-note row that is then used as a melodic device. Later works include Rock/Paper/Scissors and How It Happens, commissioned by the Kronos Quartet. The latter of these returns to sampling techniques: the first half is built around the recorded voice of the American political commentator I.F. Stone, while the second half uses synthesizers to create a dense, Latin-influenced reminiscence of life on New York's Lower East Side. He has also completed a film score (Patty Hearst) and commissions from the London Contemporary Dance Theatre and the Boston Ballet.

Johnson, Thor (b Wisconsin Rapids, WI, 10 June 1913; d Nashville, TN, 16 Jan 1975). American conductor. While studying at the University of North Carolina he became associate conductor of the North Carolina State SO. At the University of Michigan he founded the Little SO, which he conducted (1934–6, 1938–42). He continued his studies at the Salzburg Mozarteum (1936–7) and at the conservatories of Leipzig and Prague with Walter, Malko and Abendroth. He studied with Koussevitzky at the first Berkshire Music Center courses (1940 and 1941). While in the army (1942–6) he organized the first army symphony orchestra. In 1945 he appeared with the American Universities SO in Britain. His first postwar performances with the New York PO led to the conductorship of the Juilliard School orchestra, which he left in 1947 to become musical director of the Cincinnati SO. As one of the first native conductors to direct an American orchestra, Johnson did much to popularize orchestral music. During his 20-year tenure at Cincinnati he performed large-scale and little-known works, including a much-praised Gurrelieder as early as 1953. He also organized festivals in Ohio, Wisconsin and Ojai, California. From 1967 to 1975 he directed the Nashville SO. Johnson's broad-spanned conducting was best heard in the large works of the late 19th century and early 20th. His authority and energy, as well as his organizational abilities, were little known in Europe, but his work had much significance in the development of orchestral music in the USA.

RICHARD BERNAS

Johnson, Tom (b Greeley, CO, 18 Nov 1939). American composer, active in France. He studied at Yale University (BA 1961, MM 1967) and privately with Morton Feldman. In 1971 he began writing on new and experimental music for the Village Voice in New York and became an influential critic, introducing Steve Reich, Philip Glass and the downtown group of New York composers to readers throughout the USA. In 1972 the Four Note Opera established him as a successful composer. Strongly minimalist, composed with only four notes as the title implies, the opera is also humorous and accessible, depicting four singers who tell the audience what they like and dislike about their roles. Nine Bells (1979) marked a stylistic turning point. In the work, Johnson walked through a labyrinth of nine suspended fire-alarm bells, striking them to create evocative and varied music derived from the geometric pattern of his walk.

After relocating to Paris in 1983, a move encouraged by many European commissions and by his feeling that new music was taken more seriously in Europe, Johnson continued composing 'found music', in which he chose among (or simply accepted) musical possibilities generated by non-musical processes. Many works written in Paris are based on objective patterns: Chord Catalogue (1986) for keyboard consists of all 8178 chords possible within an octave; Formulas for string quartet (1994) is based on mathematical formulas. He also continued to write operas (his catalogue includes ten), of which the most successful has been Riemannoper (1988), a comedy in German with a text consisting of musical definitions from the Riemann Musik-Lexicon. Productions of this work and The Four Note Opera have made Johnson one of the most performed of contemporary opera composers, though he is rarely acknowledged as such. One work that fits into none of his other categories is Bonhoeffer Oratoriam, an impassioned setting of texts by the anti-Nazi theologian Dietrich Bonhoeffer. A collection of Johnson's criticism, The Voice of New Music, was published in 1989. One of the first composers to publish his own works, he went on to maintain two publishing companies, Two-Eighteen Press (USA) and Editions 75 (France).

Johnson, William Allen (b Nassau, NY, 27 Oct 1816; d Westfield, MA, Jan 1901). American organ builder. The son of a contractor, he initially worked as a mason in Westfield; his interest in the organ was kindled when he helped in the installation of a Hook organ in a church he had worked on. The following winter, in 1844, he attempted the construction of a chamber organ. It was successful, and he spent subsequent winters in this way until 1851, when he abandoned masonry for full-time organ building and opened a small shop. In 1854 his first three-manual organ was built for the South Church in Hartford, Connecticut, and by the following year he was employing up to 20 men. In 1871 his son William H. Johnson (b 30 June 1841; d Westfield, MA, 20 April 1922) joined the firm, and in the same year the factory was destroyed by fire. The name of the firm was changed to Johnson & Son in 1875, and in 1885, owing to increasing popularity in the Western Reserve states, a larger factory was built. William A. Johnson retired in 1890, and his son closed the company in 1898, possibly because of his unwillingness to convert their operations to the increasingly popular pneumatic or electric types of action, although the Barker lever had been used in large installations since the 1870s. Johnson's work was noted for its agreeable voicing, and his important instruments include those in St Mary of the Sacred Heart Church, Boston (1877), the First Methodist Church, Westfield (1876), and the Central Music Hall, Chicago (1880). He also built two studio organs for the organist and composer Dudley Buck.

Johnson, Willie Gary. See JOHNSON, BUNK.

Johnston, Ben(jamin Burwell) (b Macon, GA, 15 March 1926). American composer. His music was first performed in public when he was 16, and his interest in 'more nearly perfect' tuning is documented as early as 1944. After serving in the US Navy, he played in dance bands and then completed the BFA at William and Mary College, Williamsburg (1949). In 1950, he abandoned studies at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music to work with Partch in Gualala, California; he also enrolled at Mills College and studied with Milhaud (MFA 1952). In 1951, he was appointed to a combined dance and music position at the University of Illinois; he was granted tenure there in 1959, became a professor in 1967, and retired as professor emeritus in 1983. In addition to composition and teaching, he organized the première of Partch's The Bewitched with Alwin Nikolais's choreography (Urbana, 1957), chaired the university's influential Festival of Contemporary Arts (1962–5), held guest professorships and lectured widely on microtonality and other subjects. He also sought performers willing to learn his music, made more challenging by a microtonal notation based on actual pitch (rather than the tablature found in Partch's music).

Johnston's reputation has rested primarily on his work in microtonality. However, his earlier music was in equal temperament, with a tendency towards neo-classicism (Septet, the early piano pieces), theatre music, and sensitive song-settings. Beginning with sections of Gambit, he explored serial techniques, later incorporating metric modulation and proportional relationships. Humour found its way into his work through quotation and pun (Ivesberg Revisited, Newcastle Troppo) and popular eclecticism (Gertrude, or Would She Be Pleased to Receive It?). He also experimented with indeterminacy (influenced by his teacher and friend Cage) and improvisation, especially in a performance-theatre context (Five Do-It-Yourself Pieces).

With Five Fragments (1960), Johnston began using just intonation. While Partch's theory was proundly influential on him, his more comfortable relationship to Western art music and lack of instrument building skills led him to compose primarily for traditional instruments and genres, especially the string quartet. In many works he has synthesized just intonation, proportions, and serialism, where ratios might determine duration or metric modulation (Knocking Piece) or a row exist in microtonal as well as transposed forms. He employs two structuralist approaches to just intonation: scalar (e.g. Suite for Microtonal Piano), where the 12 repeating pitch classes per octave range as far as the 27th partial; and three-dimensional 'lattice-work', starting from C and evolving according to the partials chosen; this develops Partch's theory of expanded consonance beyond the 11th-partial limit while increasing greatly the potential for modulation, a frequent device in the quartets.

Despite his commitment to just intonation, Johnston has never been dogmatic about compositional choices. The majority of his pieces are tonal; many works or movements are in ternary or variation form. He has often composed for amateur ensembles, although many have found these works difficult. While he has composed relatively little theatrical music since the 1950s, Carmilla (written with Wilford Leach) and the tour de force Calamity Jane to Her Daughter have proved two of his most popular works.

The 1960s were years of personal crisis, and this is reflected in a pervasive use of almost violent contrasts and personality changes (Sonata/Grindlemusic for microtonal piano, with 81 different pitch-classes spread among the 88 keys). In Crossings, the conflict of Quartet no.3 ('Vergings') is followed by a period of silence, and then resolution in Quartet no.4 ('Ascent'), a variation set also known as Amazing Grace. Johnston's subsequent conversion to Catholicism is felt more in the spirit of later works than in specific borrowings; their tone is more American vernacular than religious.

RICHARD KASSEL

Johnston, James (b Belfast, 13 Aug 1903; d Belfast, 17 Oct 1991). Irish tenor. He studied privately and made his début in 1940 in Dublin as the Duke of Mantua in Rigoletto. In 1945 he was engaged by Sadler's Wells, and while their leading tenor (1946–50) he sang Gabriele Adorno in the English première of Simon Boccanegra (1948), as well as Don Carlos, Pinkerton, Jeník and Hugh the Drover. He made his début at Covent Garden in 1949 as Alfredo, and the same year created Hector in Bliss's The Olympians there; he went on to become a principal tenor at Covent Garden (1951–8), singing Manrico (to Callas's Leonora), Radames, Don José, Cavaradossi and Calaf. He sang Macduff at Glyndebourne in 1952. Johnston had a ringing tone and unaffected delivery, and sang with rare fervour.

ALAN BLYTH

Johnston, Thomas (b Boston, 1708; d Boston, 8 May 1767). American organ builder, music engraver, craftsman and musician. In 1739 he led the singing in the Brattle Street Church, Boston, and was paid for singing in King's Chapel in 1754–6. He was active as an ornamental painter and japanner, and as an engraver of maps, certificates, trade cards, music etc.; he is also regarded as Boston's first professional organ builder. He is recorded as having tuned and repaired some of the imported English organs in Boston, which presumably served as his only textbook in the craft of organ building. In 1744 Johnston made repairs to a small English organ in Christ Church (Old North Church), Boston, and he later tuned the three-manual Richard Bridge organ imported by King's Chapel in 1756, which appears to have been the model for the two-manual organ he built for Christ Church in 1759. Other organs he is known to have built were for St Peter's Church, Salem, Massachusetts (1754), the Concert Hall, Boston (*c*1755, later moved to King's Church, Providence, Rhode Island), and St John's Church, Portsmouth, New Hampshire (1760); he also made some chamber organs.

In 1758 Johnston engraved and published his Rules to Learn to Sing, and Hymns, containing 68 hymns set in three parts. He also brought out two editions (?1759, 1764) of Thomas Walter's The Grounds and Rules of Music (first published in Boston, 1721) and in 1766 a newly engraved version of Daniel Bayley's A New and Complete Introduction (Newbury, Massachusetts, 1764). Johnston's son Benjamin (1740–1818) and son-in-law Daniel Rea jr worked with him and succeeded him after his death; Benjamin engraved music (including William Billings's Music in Miniature), and both are recorded as having repaired musical instruments.

Joint. The detachable sections which form the tubes of modern woodwind instruments are generally termed 'joints'. They are connected by matched tenons and sockets turned from the mating pieces, the union being made firm and airtight with greased thread or thin cork sheet. Occasionally telescopic sections of thin metal tubing are also used for this purpose.

Towards the end of the 17th century, and in the early years of the 18th, transverse flutes, recorders and various double-reed types underwent a great transformation, mainly in the hands of distinguished instrument maker-players attached to the French court, and among their characteristic new features was a jointed construction. Hitherto virtually all woodwind instruments had been turned and bored from a single billet except perhaps where the available material was of limited size. The new construction permitted more accurate boring as well as a finer internal adjustment; it made possible the provision of alternative sections of slightly different length and hole spacing (corps or pièces de rechange) as an aid to adjustment to varying pitch standards.

PHILIP BATE

Jokinen, Erkki (b Janakkala, 16 Oct 1941). Finnish composer. He studied with Kokkonen and Bergman at the Sibelius Academy in Helsinki, and with Ton de Leeuw in Bilthoven in 1971. In 1985 he was appointed to teach music theory and composition at the Sibelius Academy. His central concern is instrumental music; while he writes for a variety of combinations, he has a special attachment to the accordion. His formal thinking is based on the juxtaposition and opposition of different gestures and texture types (including aleatory pitch fields); later works place increasing emphasis on polyphonic textures. A more wide-ranging development of ideas is evident in the three chamber concertos, in which different groups within the ensemble vie for dominance over the soloist and among themselves. Jokinen's music is characterized by a nervous energy, a keen sense of harmony and colour and by an economy of material that suggests analogies with serialism, while not involving serial techniques as such.

ILKKA ORAMO

Jolas, Betsy (b Paris, 5 Aug 1926). French composer. She was brought up in an artistic and literary milieu, and remembers in her childhood visits from writers such as Joyce, Stein and Hemingway, who were all published in the literary journal Transition that her parents founded and edited (1937–47). After the family moved from Paris to New York in 1940 she studied at the Lycée Français and then at Bennington College (1945–6), where in addition to her formal lessons she gained a thorough acquaintance with the 16th-century polyphonists, especially Lassus, through singing and playing with the Dessoff choir. Returning to France in 1948, she married Gabriel Illouz the following year; they had three children. Meanwhile Jolas continued her studies at the Paris Conservatoire, where her teachers included Messiaen and Milhaud. She first heard Webern's Fünf Stücke op.10 in the early 1950s, a discovery which struck her like 'a lightning bolt', and soon, despite Milhaud's misgivings, she was getting to know the music of avant-garde contemporaries such as Boulez and Stockhausen.

With their rigorously contrapuntal conception of musical form and their enthusiasm for unusual timbres and previously unexplored means of sound-production, from voices and instruments alike, these composers provided a source for much that became characteristic of Jolas' own emerging style. But there were important differences in her outlook, not least her passion for the voice and its expressive qualities. The confrontation of this essentially lyrical impulse with vocal writing which embraces the full gamut of avant-garde fragmentation, timbral experimentation and virtuosity gives her vocal works a special intensity, as in the deliberate exploitation of the confusions and complexities of contrapuntal text-setting in Mots (1963), or the later Sonate à 12 (1970), a tour-de-force of vocal invention and wordless drama. In Quatuor II, for soprano and string trio (1964), the textless voice sometimes opposes the strings, sometimes combines with them in more homogenous textures, but is always treated as fully equal to the other three parts in flexibility and sophistication, pursuing a kaleidoscopic and restless stream of invention. The work was commissioned and first performed by the Domaine Musical, and marked a breakthrough in public recognition for Jolas. D'un opéra de voyage (1967) brings about a complementary transformation, as the instrumental parts are treated like voices. This urge to celebrate the dramatic and expressive qualities of individual musical lines, whether instrumental or vocal, suggests parallels with the music of Berio.

Another distinctive feature of Jolas' music which crystallized during the 1960s was her approach to rhythm and metre. Taking her inspiration from both Debussy and Lassus, she 'unlearnt' the traditional musical demarcation of time into strong and regular beats. J.D.E. (1966) presents one of the first in a long line of inventive and economical solutions to the problem of writing polyphonic music which loosens the ties of conventional rhythmic coordination, without sacrificing the contrapuntal relation of the parts by allowing freely unsynchronized playing. Placing notes within a given duration, rather than 'on' the beat, and smoothly but continually altering the tempo of the underlying beats, are two of the means used to create the undulating flow characteristic of Jolas' music. This fluidity is also apparent in her melodic contours, which frequently involve portamento and glissando, and in the textures and larger formal sections of a work, which are often seamlessly transformed one into another.

Together with her delight in blurring the distinction between voices and instruments, these preoccupations have remained characteristic of Jolas' music. While continuing to compose for non-standard ensembles (as in D'un opéra de poupée and Points d'or, both 1982), she began in the 1970s to write for full orchestra, often with a solo instrument. Several of these concerto-style pieces are cast in the form of a wordless song-cycle, beginning with the lyrical 11 Lieder for trumpet and orchestra (1977). At the same time she began to make use of the traditional ensembles of chamber music, beginning with the string quartet in Quatuor III (1973), an especially concentrated work cast as a succession of short études each exploring a specific kind of musical material or relationship between the four parts. Given her view of music as 'sung' melodic expression, it was inevitable that this reconsideration of the ensembles and institutions of the past would culminate in an opera. Two chamber operas seek in different ways to recreate the immediacy of popular (and ancient) theatrical forms: in the second of these, Le Cyclope (1986), which sets a satyr-play by Euripides word for word (in French), she succeeds in creating a particularly fluid, conversational kind of word-setting. The piece was written as a respite from work on her grand opera Schliemann (1983–93), an epic work on the theme of a lifelong quest which includes much play with different languages and musical cultures. While working on the score Jolas studied some of the operas she most admires, from Don Giovanni to Wozzeck, and occasionally acknowledged her debt in the music: she has no desire to reject the past, and feels able to take inspiration from earlier composers without compromising the integrity of her own, fully contemporary language. Thus she has described the organ piece Musique de jour (1976) as 'a sort of four-voice fugue' and 'a homage to Monteverdi and Bach', yet these models have been wholly absorbed into the work's own highly individual means of expression.

Since 1953, Jolas has accrued a host of prestigious awards and honours. She has also had a distinguished career as a teacher: she has been much in demand as visiting professor in numerous American universities, and she assisted and then succeeded Messiaen as professor of analysis (1975) and professor of composition (1978) at the Paris Conservatoire.

JEREMY THURLOW

Jolivet, André (b Paris, 8 Aug 1905; d Paris, 20 Dec 1974). French composer. His father, a painter, and his mother, a pianist, encouraged him to become a teacher, despite his obvious early musical talent; from the age of 14 he took cello lessons with Louis Feuillard, set his own poem to music at 13 and at 15 designed and composed music for a ballet. The music of Debussy, Dukas and Ravel made a lasting impression on him at the Pasdeloup concerts in 1919. In 1920 the Abbé Théodas, maître de chapelle of Notre Dame de Clignancourt, Paris, accepted him as a chorister, teaching him harmony and organ. He left school that year and trained as a teacher, taking up various posts in Paris from 1927. Some early piano compositions date from this period, including Romance barbare (1920) and Sarabande sur le nom d'Eric Satie (1925). In 1928 he started lessons with Paul Le Flem, director of the Chanteurs de St Gervais, whose rigorous training in counterpoint, harmony and classical forms often drew on 15th- and 16th-century polyphonists.

Jolivet's first significant exposure to atonal music occurred in December 1927 at the Société Musicale Indépendante's Schoenberg concerts at the Salle Pleyel, where he heard Pierrot lunaire sung by Marya Freund, piano pieces performed by Eduard Steuermann and the Suite op.29. In 1929 Varèse's Amériques had a profound impact on him; Jolivet was struck by the large orchestral forces, dominated by percussion. Le Flem, responding to Jolivet's enthusiasm, introduced him to Varèse, who accepted him as his only European student. Varèse's impact is evident in Jolivet's experimentation with sound-masses, acoustics, orchestration and atonal (though non-serial) methods.

Jolivet's first important compositions date from 1930, with works such as Air pour bercer, Suite for string trio and Trois temps. Varèse returned to the USA in 1933 leaving Jolivet six objects: a puppet, a magic bird, a statue of a Balinese princess, and a goat, cow and winged horse sculpted by Calder, which Jolivet regarded as fetish objects. In 1935 he composed Mana for piano, naming a movement after each object. Contrast is created between the rhythmically free portrayal of the puppet, the short halting phrases of the bird, the rhythmic momentum of the Balinese princess, and the long flexible lines evoking the cow. Movements 3, 4 and 5 are unified by the tritone; the opening of the fifth movement is based on two transpositions of the octatonic scale. Mana began Jolivet's so-called 'magic' period. Cinq incantations for solo flute (1936) and Cinq danses rituelles (1939) are concerned with the life-cycle and with harvest. While the former work contains shifting and flexible rhythms, repeated phrases and single notes, the latter is characterized by syncopation and heavily dotted rhythms. Jolivet exploits the dissonant effect of the repeated diminished octaves and minor seconds in the final section of the nuptial dance. By focussing on ritual, incantation and initiation practices, Jolivet sought inspiration from African and East Asian traditions.

Messiaen, a jury member of the Société Nationale, helped to get Jolivet's Trois temps pour piano (1930) performed by the society in 1931. In a review of Mana, Messiaen noted the 'novelty of its idiom and the singularity of its aesthetic', which, in his view, seemed 'to express the new aspirations'. They both shared an interest in spiritual concerns and a desire to widen the emotional range of music. In 1935 Jolivet, Messiaen and Daniel-Lesur founded 'La spirale', an avant-garde chamber music society. Then in 1936, with Yves Baudrier, they formed the group known as 'La jeune France', their first concert taking place on 3 June 1936, conducted by Désormière. They became known as the 'quatre petits frères spiritualistes' because they promoted spiritual values and human qualities in a 'mechanical and impersonal' world. They also rejected Stravinsky's neo-classicism, Satie, Les Six and central European experiments. The group's activities were curtailed by World War II. In 1940 Messiaen was interned and Jolivet was mobilized at Fontainebleau. Here he wrote a Messe pour le jour de la paix for voice, organ and tambourine (1940). Another important war-inspired work was the Trois complaintes du soldat for voice and piano or orchestra (1940).

In 1945 Jolivet published an article in Noir et Blanc entitled 'Assez Stravinsky', in which he declared that 'true French music owes nothing to Stravinsky'. Poulenc replied, defending Stravinsky, with an article in Le Figaro, 'Vive Stravinsky'. In 1946 Jolivet responded to an enquiry on musical aesthetics and technique ('Magie expérimentale' in Contrepoints), in which he reaffirmed his musical aims, including his desire to rediscover music's 'original ancient meaning'. He also outlined his preoccupation with acoustics, particularly his use of 'doubled basses' in preference to the 'artificial twelve-note system'; by selecting two bass notes, he was able to exploit the harmonies that were available from both harmonic series.

Jolivet simplified his style during the war, abandoning atonality in favour of lyricism and striving for a music for 'evasion and relaxation'. Examples include the comic opera Dolorès, ou Le miracle de la femme laide (1942) and the ballet Guignol et Pandore (1943) on which he collaborated with Serge Lifar. In this farce, the director, who controls the human characters, is himself a puppet. The music is tonal, modal and simple, with repetitive rhythms and pentatonic glissandos, and tritones in the execution scene. The chamber works Chant de Linos (1944) and Hopi Snake Dance (1948) reveal his continuing preoccupation with ritual; the former exploits the flute's technical capabilities and reveals the influence of Le Flem's teaching in the contrapuntal independence of the lines. From about 1945 Jolivet achieved a fusion between his new-found accessibility and his earlier experimentation. Serge Gut has identified this synthesis in the First Piano Sonata (1945), written in memory of Bartók. Elements of virtuosity, dissonance and rhythmic drive feature in Fantaisie-Caprice for flute and piano (1953), Sérénade for two guitars (1956) and the numerous concertos, including two for cello (1962 and 1966) and one for violin (1972).

Between 1945 and 1959 Jolivet was musical director of the Comédie Française. He composed 14 scores for plays by Molière, Racine, Sophocles, Shakespeare and Claudel. He had the opportunity to travel widely, to the Middle East and East Asia and to Africa; his visit to Egypt rekindled his interest in ritual in works such as Epithalame for a 12-voice 'vocal orchestra' (1953), based on sacred Egyptian, Hindu, Chinese and Greek texts, and the second movement of his First Symphony (1953). The Concerto for Piano and Orchestra (1949–50) was the result of a commission from Radio France for 'a work of colonial inspiration' and was awarded the Grand Prix de la Ville de Paris; by drawing on musical elements from Africa, East Asia and Polynesia, Jolivet was continuing the tradition of French exoticism established by Bizet, Chabrier, Debussy, Ravel and Messiaen.

Jolivet's interest in French culture is evident from his oratorio La vérité de Jeanne (1956). Based on a 15th-century text rehabilitating Joan of Arc, it was performed in Domrémy for her 500th anniversary. His orchestral work Les amants magnifiques (1961) also involved a homage to France's past in Molière and Lully. Jolivet employs Baroque dance figures, ground bass and harpsichord, but reveals his individuality in emphasizing percussion, block writing, glissandos and harmonics. Jolivet founded the Centre Français d'Humanisme Musical at Aix-en-Provence in 1959 and taught composition at the Paris Conservatoire from 1961. His last commission, to write an opera, Le soldat inconnu for the Palais Garnier, was incomplete at his death.

BARBARA KELLY

Jollage, Charles-Alexandre (d ?Paris, 1761). French organist and composer. He is identified on the title-page of his only publication, Premier livre de pièces de clavecin (Paris, 1738), as 'formerly organist to the King of Poland'. The appointment probably terminated in 1733, when Stanislaus returned from Chambord to Warsaw to claim his throne. The dedication of the pieces to the Marquise of Clermont d'Amboise suggests that he had for some time been active in Paris as a harpsichord teacher, since he had presented 'most' of them to her before publication. About 1740 he inaugurated the organ of the Petits-Pères (the chapel of an Augustinian convent, now the church of Notre Dame des Victoires), was appointed organist then or later, and continued there until his death. He appeared at the Concert Spirituel on 24 December 1750, and in 1755 he became one of the four quarterly organists of the cathedral of Notre Dame. In 1753 he was called upon by the Parisian organ builder Robert Richard, to whom he owed money, to approve an organ for the cathedral in Quebec City. With one or two exceptions, and notwithstanding occasional lapses like parallel 6-4 chords, Jollage's pieces are bland and conventional. Two of them are legato and staccato versions of the same music; another, L'italienne, seems by its style to celebrate the arrival of Scarlatti's sonatas on the Parisian scene. The publication of the air Belle Iris, vos regards (now in GB-Lbl) was announced in the Mercure de France in July 1736.

Jolson, Al [Yoelson, Asa] (b Srednice [now Seredzius], Lithuania, ? 26 May 1886; d San Francisco, 23 Oct 1950). American popular singer. Jolson's father, Moshe, was a rabbi and cantor who emigrated to Washington, DC, in 1890. His family arrived in 1894, and soon after this the young Al began appearing in burlesques and vaudeville in various partnerships that often included his older brother Harry (1882–1953). By 1906 he was performing as a vaudeville single and in 1908 he joined Lew Dockstader's Minstrels. Since 1904 Jolson's act had included the performance of coon songs and comedic banter in blackface. These were incorporated into his first Broadway appearance in La Belle Paree (1911), a revue produced by the Shubert Brothers at their newly opened Winter Garden Theatre. Jolson would make the Winter Garden his Broadway home until 1925; by then, he had been billed as 'the world's greatest entertainer' for almost ten years, a sobriquet earned through countless national tours and concert appearances.

In The Whirl of Society (1912) he introduced his trademark blackfaced stage persona, Gus, a good-hearted and mischievous servant or butler who deflates the pretensions of the society around him through wit and ingenuity. This show also incorporated a runway built from the back of the theatre to extend across the centre of the Winter Garden auditorium, and Jolson used this device to achieve an intense, almost erotic intimacy with audience members, who would often be led in singalongs or included in comedy routines. His other Broadway shows included Vera Violetta (1911), The Honeymoon Express (1913), Dancing Around (1914), Robinson Crusoe, Jr. (1916), Sinbad (1918), Bombo (1921) and Big Boy (1925). All were loose-limbed extravaganzas that left plenty of room for comedic improvisation and interpolated songs. Among these were Waiting for the Robert E Lee, You made me love you (the first song he performed on bent knee, a subsequent Jolson trademark), Rock-a-bye your baby with a dixie melody, Swanee, Avalon, My Mammy, April Showers, Toot, Toot, Tootsie, and California, here I come. Critics were constantly awed by his ability to raise trivial songs and stale jokes to the level of folk myth. His recordings from this period as well exerted an enormous influence on subsequent generations of popular singers.

Jolson's appearances in two part-sound, part-silent films, The Jazz Singer (1927) and The Singing Fool (1928), marked the pinnacle of his career. Sonny Boy, from the latter, was one of the first recordings to sell over a million copies. Subsequent films such as Hallelujah, I'm a Bum (1933), Go into Your Dance (1935), as well as two returns to Broadway in Wonder Bar (1931) and Hold On To Your Hats (1940), were not nearly as successful as the two film biographies made near the end of Jolson's life, The Jolson Story (1946) and Jolson Sings Again (1949), in which actor Larry Parks portrayed Jolson. These films featured Jolson's voice on the soundtrack, and were the culmination of a renewed interest in his career engendered by his numerous performances for American servicemen during World War II. From 1947 to 1949 he hosted NBC's 'Kraft Music Hall', his only success in a radio series.

Jolson's infectious energy and childlike innocence were part of a melting pot of vocal characteristics he absorbed from a variety of theatrical traditions. He would glide as easily between singing, declamation and speaking, within the course of a song, as he would shift between the mixed register production of an operatic tenor and the growling baritone shouting of a blues singer. He made liberal use of portamento, appoggiaturas and mordents, while his rhythmic and melodic inventiveness matched that of any jazz singer, as a comparison between the printed score and any of his recordings of a given song will attest. His diction also featured the nasal vowels, word-pulling ('be-lew' for blue) and aspirated attacks ('a-you') of the stereotypical Irish tenor. Jolson's best performances were recorded before his style became mannered in the 1920s.

Joly, Simon (b 1524; d after 1558). French composer. He was organist at the cathedral of St Etienne, Bourges, in 1559, and enjoyed the patronage of Cardinal François de Tournon. Joly dedicated to Tournon his Psalmi quinquagesemi perpulchra (Lyons, 1552), four-voice settings of Latin paraphrases of all 20 verses of Psalm l, Miserere mei. He is praised in a sonnet by Philibert Bugnyon, published at Lyons in 1557.

Jommelli [Jomelli], Niccolò [Nicolò] (b Aversa, 10 Sept 1714; d Naples, 25 Aug 1774). Italian composer. He was important among those who initiated the mid-18th-century modifications to singer-dominated Italian opera. His greatest achievements represent a combination of German complexity, French decorative elements and Italian brio, welded together by an extraordinary gift for dramatic effectiveness.

1. Early career. 2. The Stuttgart years. 3. The final years.

1. EARLY CAREER. Jommelli's musical training began under Canon Muzzillo, director of the cathedral choir at Aversa. In 1725 he went to the Conservatorio S Onofrio in Naples, where he studied with Prota and Feo; he transferred to the Conservatorio Pietà dei Turchini in 1728, where his teachers included Nicola Fago. He was also influenced by the composers active in Naples during his student years, notably Hasse and Leo. Later, to Schubart, he admitted his debt to both Hasse and Graun. His public career began with two comic operas for Naples, L'errore amorosa in spring 1737 and Odoardo in winter 1738. The success of his first serious opera, Ricimero re di Goti, at Rome in 1740 brought him to the attention of a wealthy and influential patron, Cardinal Henry Benedict, Duke of York.

An early exposure to Hasse's obbligato recitative must have impressed the young Jommelli with the capacity of motivic orchestral writing to create an intensified emotional effect at particularly dramatic moments. Speaking of Jommelli's obbligato recitative for Ricimero, Charles de Brosses declared that the force of the declamation, the variety of the harmony and the sublimity of the accompaniment created a sense of drama greater than the best French recitative and the most beautiful of Italian melody.

For the production of his setting of Metastasio's Ezio in 1741, Jommelli moved to Bologna, where he met and had lessons with Giovanni Battista ('Padre') Martini, establishing a lifelong friendship (nine letters from Jommelli to Martini are in I-Bc). He was elected a member of the Accademia Filarmonica. Later that year he composed his first opera for Venice, Merope. Its first and second acts are linked with an unusual scene including chorus, obbligato recitative, ballet and pantomime, depicting war games, foreshadowing in startling fashion the French-inspired operas to come in the latter half of the century. In the next few years he wrote operas for Bologna, Venice, Turin, Ferrara and Padua, as well as two oratorios which were widely performed, Isacco figura del Redentore and La Betulia liberata.

In 1743 or 1745 Jommelli received, on Hasse's recommendation, his first permanent position as musical director of the Ospedale degli Incurabili, one of Venice's conservatories for girls. Early biographers place this appointment in 1743 but all of his compositions for the conservatory date from 1745 or after. For the women who sang in the church services, he composed a group of sacred works, among them two oratorios, a Kyrie–Gloria mass, settings of psalms and several solo motets. He also wrote a Te Deum for mixed voices. These works show a great variety in the types of movements, use of keys, sequences of choruses, arias and ensembles. The most important sacred composition of this period is the psalm Laudate pueri in B♭ for two women's choruses, soloists and two string orchestras. In addition to this output of sacred music, Jommelli maintained his creativity in the operatic sphere.

The basic characteristics of his mature style were already emerging: the incursion of declamatory elements in the aria, audacious harmonic effects, abundant modulations, chromaticism, and the exploration of orchestral resources such as the use of the second violin as an independent textural element, the occasional independent viola parts, the abundant dynamic indications and the development of the crescendo effect, which reached Mannheim from Italy through Jommelli's Italian sinfonias, in which Johann Stamitz first heard the innovations since credited to him. Symphonic construction, without repeat signs and with a contrasting second theme in the dominant key, contrasting sections for pairs of instruments, sharp dynamic contrasts and crescendos can all be found in Jommelli's opera sinfonias of the 1740s. The basic units of compositions, at the level of motif and phrase in Jommelli's sinfonias, doubled (as Wolf has observed) in the 1740s: 2 + 2 becomes 4 + 4. The same process in vocal music led to a doubling in the length of the ordinary aria during the decade. Equally significant, Jommelli increasingly wrote arias in which the internal structure and function are clearly differentiated, using techniques associated with instrumental sonata procedures. Many of his arias of the 1740s have first themes, transitions, second and closing themes, clearly delineated by changes in texture, dynamics and orchestration. His interest in formal clarity was most pronounced during this decade, during which he was writing the most 'modern-sounding' music of anyone (Terradellas being a close second and Galuppi joining them around 1745); he also stands out for his interest and skill in the details of expression.

Jommelli left Venice at the end of 1746 or the beginning of 1747, because on 28 January 1747 he produced in Rome his first version of Didone abbandonata. In addition to operas for Rome, Jommelli fulfilled commissions for Naples and Parma. In 1748 Jommelli wrote L'amore in maschera, his first comic opera for ten years. His few intermezzos followed within a few years. L'uccellatrice was written for Venice and performed there in May 1750. A reworked version, Il parataio, was presented by the Italian buffo troupe during its controversial appearance in Paris in 1753. Thus Jommelli, along with Pergolesi and others, contributed fodder to the Querelle des Bouffons and to the clamour for more italianate elements in French opera voiced by the Encyclopedists Rousseau, Grimm and Diderot.

In the early 1750s Jommelli's work gravitated towards sacred music, beginning with the oratorio La passione di Gesù Cristo, composed in Rome in 1749. The composer dedicated this work to Cardinal Heinrich Benedict, Duke of York, who had been his patron for many years. This gained him entrance to influential papal circles, where he met Cardinal Albani. In the first days of April 1749 the prefect of music in the Vatican, Monsignor Passionei, commissioned Jommelli and another Neapolitan composer, David Perez, to write a Miserere as a demonstration of their capabilities. Backed by Cardinal Albani and Passionei, Jommelli was then elected maestro coadiutore of S Pietro with a decree issued on 20 April. The decree asserted that he must be in Rome for the beginning of the Holy Jubilee Year of 1750 and follow indispensably the year-round service in the basilica.

Meanwhile, equally important to his career was a commission Albani secured for him from Vienna in 1749. Here he composed Achille in Sciro and a second version of Didone abbandonata. Metastasio, then court poet at Vienna, reported that Jommelli's Achille far exceeded expectations. He believed Jommelli to be unrivalled in his ability to seize the heart of the listener with his delicate and sensitive melody. The early Viennese symphonists, Dittersdorf and Wagenseil, later acknowledged Jommelli's influence upon the formation of their symphonic style (see Hell, 1971).

Jommelli returned from Vienna to Rome somewhat late, and there he found that the Congregazione di S Cecilia was trying to prevent him from assuming his duties as maestro di cappella at S Pietro. The pope himself had to declare that Jommelli was his virtuoso in order to exempt him from the examination of the Congregazione. It was only on 14 June 1750, the day of Corpus Christi, that Jommelli appeared for the first time at S Pietro as maestro di cappella. Thus began a period of creativity during which the output of sacred music reached for the first – and only – time in his life a level at least comparable to that of his operatic output. For about three and a half years Jommelli composed a considerable number of liturgical pieces as regular requirements for the Cappella Giulia. Besides contributions to the proprium of the Mass (sequences, graduals and offertories), most of them were destined for the musical services of the Offices, particularly in the Vespers. The compositions are mostly written in the stile nuovo as, for example, the imposing psalm Dixit Dominus (1751) in F for solo voices, two four-part choirs and string orchestra, which contains a quartet for four virtuoso solo sopranos as well as an impressive sextet illustrating Jommelli's highly developed art of antiphonal ensemble movements. On the other hand, his fugues of up to eight parts show a noteworthy contrapuntal skill, and also of interest is the hymn Aurea luce (1750) for solo voices, double choir and figured bass. Contemporary reports attest that a total of 11 vocal groups – subdivisions of the available choirs – participated and were stationed throughout S Pietro, even in the cupola. In addition to these works, there exist several compositions for Holy Week, written in stile antico, the most outstanding of which is the complete cycle of 27 responsories for Holy Week.

By 1751 Jommelli had returned to a demanding schedule of opera composition. During the next four years he fulfilled commissions for Rome, Spoleto, Milan, Piacenza and Turin. Significant and permanent changes in Jommelli's approach to opera had taken place during his Roman sojourn (1747–55).

In Vienna Jommelli found a demand for chorus and ensemble scenes long out of vogue in Italy. Achille in Sciro is one of Metastasio's few librettos requiring a chorus. Although there are no ensembles in Jommelli's operas for Vienna, Galuppi's Artaserse performed during the previous carnival has an important ensemble, and there are a number of them in the pasticcios, for example the quartet in Merope. On his return to Italy in the early 1750s, Jommelli began incorporating ensembles and substantial final choruses into his operas. Mainly homophonic with solo and antiphonal sections, these pieces have points of imitation and independent part-writing even in the traditionally homophonic final chorus.

In pursuit of the dramatic, Jommelli cut both recitative and aria from Metastasian librettos, increasing the number of obbligato recitatives. The most powerful obbligato solo scenes were written for Dido's death at the end of Didone abbandonata and for Regolus's farewell to Rome at the close of Attilio Regolo. Burney described the latter as producing such an uncommon effect during a production in London (1754) that it was encored, the only instance within his memory when a scene of recitative had inspired such a response.

Sofonisba (1745) and Ifigenia in Aulide (1751) anticipated by more than a decade efforts to restore staged death and tragedy to opera seria. In Sofonisba the plot is allowed to proceed to its tragic conclusion; the heroine dies of a poisoned drink on stage, as she would later in Traetta's 1762 setting of Mattia Verazi's text for Mannheim. Jommelli's libretto cites no author, but Verazi may well have penned this early staged suicide, for there is a parallel in his libretto for Jommelli's Ifigenia in which 'another Iphigenia' leaps into the sea, her shocking sacrifice paving the way for a happy ending.

Jommelli's concern for the musical realization of textual imagery found expression not only in a subtly responsive vocal line but also in orchestral word-painting, in sensitive textural variation suited to the changing moods of the poetry, and in programmatic effects such as those for Arbaces' shipwreck aria in Artaserse. He was among the first to use wind instruments in other than a supporting or obbligato role: they appear in solo sections, contribute motivic interest, create effective contrasts and combine for imaginative effects of colour.

Shortly before he left Rome for Stuttgart, Jommelli joined the Arcadian Academy in Rome under the pastoral name of Anfione Eteoclide; membership presupposed an ability to extemporize poetry and Jommelli is one of very few composers, if not the only one, to have held it. This suggests that he may have had a greater hand in the shaping of his librettos than might otherwise be the case.

2. The Stuttgart years. In 1753 Jommelli was at the height of his fame; he had received offers of positions at Mannheim and Lisbon at the time the Duke of Württemberg approached him about coming to Stuttgart. An interest in Italian opera had already been established in Stuttgart before Carl Eugen came to power in 1744. The young duke had also developed a taste for French opera during his visit to Paris and Versailles in 1748: he was particularly attracted to the ensembles, choruses and ballet, the independent programmatic orchestral pieces and the elaborate staging and machinery. A new Stuttgart theatre had been completed in 1750 and a number of Jommelli's works were produced there. Fetonte, a French-inspired pasticcio containing Jommelli's music, was given there for the duke's birthday, 11 February 1753. During a trip to Italy early in the year, a firm friendship was established between Jommelli and the duke and it was arranged that Jommelli would move to Stuttgart in time for the production of La clemenza di Tito on 30 August, the birthday of the duchess, Friederike.

On 1 January 1754, Jommelli officially assumed the duties of Ober-Kapellmeister at the Stuttgart court. Although Carl Eugen reserved the right to choose the subject of an opera and to decide the form it would take, Jommelli had control over all other aspects of its production. Under his strong leadership, no aspect of music or spectacle was ignored. He knew how to take advantage of the capacities of his singers and his orchestra, welding music, drama, décor and ballet into a powerfully unified whole calculated to make the maximum effect. No expense was spared in attracting the best instrumentalists, singers, dancers and designers. Leading the orchestra were the violinists Lolli and Nardini and on the oboe were the Spanish virtuosos Juan Baptista and Joseph Plà. The prima donna Marianna Pirker was followed by Maria Masi-Giura; among a dozen castratos were Guadagni, Aprile, Potenza and Rubinelli, and Arcangelo Cortoni sang tenor roles. Stage and costume designs by Boquet were imported, and a succession of three French choreographers – Sauveterre, Noverre and Dauvigny – came to Stuttgart, where they found a fostering environment for the ballet d'action poineered by Noverre.

Jommelli's interest in the dramatic possibilities of the orchestra was allowed free rein. He built one of the finest orchestras in Europe. Numbering only 24 players in 1755, by 1767 it had grown to 47 including a lutenist, a double bass, paired wind (except clarinet), brass and percussion. Jommelli's obbligato recitative gained new strength of expression as he grew more skilled in developing the motivic material to paint the emotional state of his characters. The orchestra stepped out of its role as accompanist and became an equal partner with the singer. Schubart reported that Jommelli's programmatic orchestral effects overwhelmed his audiences.

In 1755 Jommelli collaborated with Verazi in two operas, Pelope and Enea nel Lazio. Following Carl Eugen's taste, these were a radical departure from the traditional succession of recitatives and exit arias. Built on mythological rather than historical subjects, the librettos freely combine obbligato recitative, aria, ensemble, chorus and programmatic orchestral music in dramatic scene complexes and spectacular, French-inspired finales. Among the unusually large number of ensembles in the two operas, the great quintet in Enea is outstanding. Jommelli used imitative counterpoint in his ensembles and choruses, but they are predominantly made up of solo, antiphonal and homophonic textures; they never reach the state of contrapuntal complexity that some of his biographers have indicated. The same may be said of his orchestral music which, while containing canonic imitation, is more accurately described as texturally than contrapuntally complex.

According to his contract, Jommelli had the right to return periodically to Italy, and he wrote and directed Temistocle for Naples and Creso for Rome in 1757. After the Stuttgart theatre was renovated in 1758–9, he devoted all his time to his duties there. Verazi had now moved to Mannheim, and Jommelli's operas were written on extensively modified Metastasian texts. French-style prologues were appended, scenes were tightened, eliminating much recitative and some arias, while new arias, ensembles, choruses and orchestral pieces were added. In a Metastasian libretto, a succession of exit arias left a single actor on stage for the final scene of each act (except the last); by combining the last few scenes, the act could be closed with an ensemble finale in which the participants expressed their separate emotions as in an aria.

Very little simple recitative remains in Vologeso or Fetonte, to texts by Verazi, Jommelli's last two serious operas for the Stuttgart court (given at the Ludwigsburg residence). Scenes of obbligato recitative are linked with a common key scheme. Declamatory elements invade the aria, although Jommelli's gift for melodic writing is still apparent. The da capo aria has all but disappeared, replaced by the dal segno (or partial da capo). There are many through-composed arias, some of them in two-part form rather than three-part. Shorter aria forms are scattered throughout the opera, serving to break up the long stretches of recitative with expressions of emotion intensifying the drama without stopping the action for the span of time required by full-length arias. Jommelli's ensembles show the same formal plasticity as his arias in response to dramatic demands. The last half of Act 2 is made up of two ensembles of diminishing personnel, each introduced with an aria, expanded to a quartet or trio, and then reduced to a duet when characters exit. The final trio of Fetonte is the most extensive spectacle scene in Jommelli's work: an action ensemble of a type usually found only in comic opera, it combines obbligato recitative, arioso, ensemble and chorus with a programmatic orchestral representation of a catastrophe. The flexibility of structure represents a radical departure from Metastasian conventions.

To meet the demand for lighter works, Jommelli wrote a series of serenatas and pastorales. Then, in 1766, he wrote two comic operas, La critica and Il matrimonio per concorso, both to texts by Gaetano Martinelli, the new court poet; their collaboration produced a warm friendship which lasted until Jommelli's death. Their next three operas, Il cacciatore deluso and La schiava liberata for Ludwigsburg and Le avventure di Cleomede for Lisbon, were termed dramma serio-comico. Jommelli's skill at musical caricature is shown to good advantage in these parody operas, where comedy is combined with pathos.

Jommelli's duties at Stuttgart included the supervision of church music of both denominations. Evidently he left few of his own compositions: the Missa pro defunctis in E♭ (1756), a Miserere in G minor of uncertain date, a Te Deum (1763) and a mass in D (1766). These works – the requiem in particular – achieved a relatively high degree of recognition. In contrast to Rome, at Stuttgart Jommelli was not responsible for the regular practice of the services. His sacred compositions arose mostly from external events such as the Requiem for the funeral of the duke's mother. Jommelli's compositions for the Stuttgart period make frequent reference, in a parodying vein, to earlier works but favour more integrated, less sectional forms.

3. THE FINAL YEARS. By 1768, the situation in Ludwigsburg was such that Jommelli found it expedient to begin negotiations with the court of José I in Lisbon. According to an agreement of 1769, he was to send copies of earlier operas, to compose one serious and one comic opera each year, and to write unaccompanied sacred music for the royal chapel, for a yearly pension of 400 zecchini. In lieu of his own presence in Lisbon he sent his close friend, Martinelli, with whom he remained in constant correspondence about the detailed requirements (some of this correspondence, and Jommelli's letters to and from the director of the royal theatres of Portugal survives: in CDN-Lu, D-Sl, US-BEm, and the Portuguese Ministry of Finance Archives). The Naples-trained mestre de capela, João Cordeiro da Silva, was assigned the task of revising Jommelli's work according to production circumstances in Lisbon. At the same time, arrangements were made, in accordance with his Stuttgart contract, for him to return to Aversa with his ailing wife in the hope that the southern climate would improve her health. His absence from Ludwigsburg gave his enemies an opportunity to intrigue against him, and Jommelli was cut off without his promised pension: moreover, he was refused not only the originals of his earlier works, but copies as well. In addition to his problems with Carl Eugen, Jommelli's wife died at the end of July 1769, a few months after they reached Italy.

On his return to Naples, Jommelli was immediately pressed into writing several new operas. In Armida abbandonata, his last spectacle opera, Jommelli incorporated ballet into the drama, wrote a great obbligato recitative scene for Armida, and concluded with a scene complex of cavatina, aria, ensemble and chorus. In a letter to his sister, Mozart judged Armida 'beautiful but too serious and old-fashioned for the theatre'. Mozart's reaction reflects the controversy that Jommelli's last operas for Naples inspired: a controversy represented on the one hand by Saverio Mattei, who felt that the depravity and decadence of popular taste rendered the modern audience incapable of comprehending the sublimity of Jommelli's music, 'full of harmony and contrivance', and on the other by those who stood for the unremitting trend towards a broader and less complex style. Jommelli, having already admitted to Vogler that he wished for himself Hasse's economy of means, and always concerned with the effect of his music on his audience, tried unsuccessfully to adapt his style to the Neapolitan taste.

Plagued with ill-health and gout, Jommelli completed a fourth version of Demofoonte (1770) for Naples; he then moved to Rome to write a second setting of Achille in Sciro and the comic opera L'amante cacciatore for Carnival 1771. At the same time, he was pressed to fulfil his obligations to the Portuguese court. A mass in D, which from the Credo on reverts to the Württemberg mass of 1766, the Easter sequence Victimae paschali, a number of substitute arias, and parts of a fourth version of Ezio had been sent before he went to Rome. Le avventure di Cleomede was completed shortly after he returned to Naples early in April. Ifigenia in Tauride, the sixth opera written in little more than a year, was finished on the day of the first performance (30 May 1771) in Naples: hastily and inadequately prepared, it was a complete disaster and had to be replaced within a few weeks by a new production of Armida abbandonata. Mattei observed that Ifigenia later came to be 'admired and thought far superior to the two former'. The final arias for Ezio had been sent to Lisbon when, in August, Jommelli suffered a paralytic stroke. A year later he had recovered sufficient use of his hands to write, for private performance in Naples, the serenata Cerere placata, in the best tradition of his spectacular late style, and to begin work on a third opera for Lisbon.

Jommelli's last work for Naples, a Miserere on Psalm 50 (Pietà Signore) translated into Italian by his close friend, Mattei, was performed by Aprile and De Amicis during Holy Week 1774, with the composer at the keyboard. The final instalment of Il trionfo di Clelia arrived in Lisbon a month before the scheduled performance for the king's birthday on 6 June. From Carnival 1769 until the death of José I in 1777, the royal Portuguese theatres presented to appreciative audiences as many as four of Jommelli's operas each year. The enthusiastic report of the success of Clelia in Lisbon probably reached Jommelli little more than a month before his death in August. At the instigation of the maestro, Gennaro Manna, the musicians and poets of Naples collaborated in a grand public funeral to honour the passing of a great master.

At the time of his death, Jommelli was regarded as one of the greatest composers of his time. He was always among those cited when memorable composers of the century were named. In Stuttgart, Schubart declared:

> The greatest musical Pan is dead . . . If richness of thought, glittering fantasy, inexhaustible melody, heavenly harmony, deep understanding of all instruments, and particularly the full magical strength of the human voice – if great art affects entirely each chord of the human heart, if all these – yet combined with the sharpest understanding of musical poetry – constitute a musical genius, then in him Europe has lost its greatest composer.

In De la musique en Italie Aleksandr Beloselsky wrote that Jommelli could 'be regarded universally as the most profound and the greatest artist who has ever distinguished himself in the harmonious profession'. Arteaga described him as 'truly original in having such excellent qualities as the felicity of his musical imagination, which earned him the appellation of the Chiabrera, and the Horace of composers, the coupling of expression and difficulty, the richness, and the energy and vivacity of his scoring'.

MARITA P. McCLYMONDS (with PAUL CAUTHEN, WOLFGANG HOCHSTEIN, MAURICIO DOTTORI)

Jonas, Emile (b Paris, 5 March 1827; d Saint Germain-en-Laye, 22 May 1905). French composer. He entered the Paris Conservatoire in October 1841, gaining second prize for harmony in 1846, first prize in 1847 and the second Grand Prix in 1849. From 1847 to 1866 he was professor of solfège at the Conservatoire, and from 1859 professor of harmony for military bands. He became director of music at the Portuguese synagogue, and published a collection of Hebrew tunes in 1854. He was an early contributor to Offenbach's Bouffes-Parisiens with the one-act operetta Le duel de Benjamin (1855), followed by Le roi boit (1857) and several more. Les deux arlequins (1865) and Le canard à trois becs (1869) gave him success abroad, and their production at the Gaiety Theatre, London, led to a commission for the three-act Cinderella the Younger (1871), later produced in Paris as Javotte. Le chignon d'or (1873) was his last work of real significance. La bonne aventure (1882) and Le premier baiser (1883), his opéras comiques, achieved little success. Though a composer of lively music in the vein of Offenbach and Hervé, he lacked their individuality and inspiration.

ANDREW LAMB

Jonas, Justus [Koch, Jodocus] (b Nordhausen, 5 June 1493; d Eisleben, 9 Oct 1555). German theologian and hymn writer. In 1506 he matriculated at Erfurt University, took his doctorate examinations on 16 August 1518, and in 1519 was rector and lecturer in ecclesiastical law. In the same year he visited Erasmus in the Netherlands, but soon turned to Luther, accompanying him in 1521 to Worms for the Reichstag. He became professor of canonical law at Wittenberg University and provost of the Schlosskirche in the same year. In 1542 he went as senior minister to Halle but was driven out after the Schmalkaldian War. He worked at Hildesheim, Coburg and Regensburg, took part in the foundation of Jena University in 1553, and finally became senior minister at Eisleben. Nine hymns by him were set to music in the early days of the Reformed Church, including Wo Gott der Herr nicht bei uns ist; the melodies may be by Jonas. He was keenly interested in the new ways in which music was used in Reformed worship, and was responsible for establishing the order used in churches under his jurisdiction.

HANS-CHRISTIAN MÜLLER

Jonas, Oswald (b Vienna, 10 Jan 1897; d Riverside, CA, 19 March 1978). American musicologist of Austrian birth. He was a private pupil of Schenker (1915–22); he also studied law at the University of Vienna, taking the doctorate in 1921. The next years were spent in examining Schenker's teachings and studying composers' manuscripts partly with a view towards improving performance. After some years in Berlin teaching at the Stern Conservatory (1930–34), he returned to Vienna to help found the Schenker Institute at the New Vienna Conservatory, and the periodical Der Dreiklang (1937–8), which he edited with Felix Salzer. In 1938 he emigrated to the USA, where he lectured extensively and taught at Roosevelt University (Chicago) and its associated institutions (1941–64). He subsequently taught at the Vienna Music Academy (1964–5) and at the University of California, Riverside (from 1966), and he also lectured at the universities of Tübingen, Hamburg, Warsaw and Berne.

Most of Jonas's musicological writings are the results of his studies of manuscripts: he was also Schenker's biographer and a recognized authority on his analytical methods, which he considered closely bound to the music of the period between Bach and Brahms and not applicable outside those limits. His editions include several of Schenker's works (including his study of Beethoven's last piano sonatas), a volume of C.P.E. Bach's works (for the piano) and various pieces by 18th- and 19th-century composers. He provided the fingerings for Christa Landon's complete edition of Haydn's piano sonatas (Vienna, 1964–6).

RAMONA H. MATTHEWS

Joncières, Victorin de [Rossignol, Félix-Ludger] (b Paris, 12 April 1839; d Paris, 26 Oct 1903). French composer and critic. The son of a journalist on La patrie, Joncières began learning the piano with an aunt but, at 16, decided to study painting. His Le sicilien, adapted from Molière, was given a public performance by students at the Conservatoire in 1859, however, and was so well received that he followed the advice of a music critic present (Franck Marie of La patrie) and took up music full-time. He entered the Conservatoire, learning counterpoint and fugue with Leborne, but left early in 1860 after disagreement over the advent in Paris of Wagner, whom Joncières initially fervently admired, and whose first Parisian concert had taken place on 25 January of that year at the Théâtre Italien. He wrote incidental music for a French version of Hamlet, which he had performed in May 1863 at his own expense; the play was then put on with his music at Nantes in 1867 and at the Théâtre de la Gaîté, Paris, in 1868. His next two operas, Sardanapale and Le dernier jour de Pompéï, given at the Théâtre Lyrique, were both failures. Dimitri (1876) met with some critical acclaim, though Fétis was quick to note that there were very few recognizably Wagnerian passages in a work from the pen of such an ardent Wagnerian. The public did not support Dimitri, however; indeed, of Joncières' works only Le chevalier Jean (which Chabrier called 'unbelievably old-fashioned') enjoyed any enduring popularity, largely in Germany (as Johann von Lothringen). That opera's revival at the Opéra-Comique was prevented by the disastrous fire of 1887, however, which destroyed the sets, stored at the theatre in preparation for a dress rehearsal.

Between 1871 and 1900, Joncières wrote for La liberté under the name 'Jennius'. He was immensely conceited, and his highly sarcastic attacks indiscriminate – Fétis compared him to Berlioz in alienating his readership through too much negative criticism. As Wagner became more popular in France, Joncières' enthusiasm for his music waned: he thought the later works antipathetic to the French genius. Composers he was sympathetic towards, on the other hand, were very few; Bizet and Offenbach the most notable. Admitted to the Légion d'Honneur in 1877, he was a candidate for the Académie des Beaux-Arts in 1884, to replace the composer Victor Massé who had recently died, but Delibes was elected instead. He was also a founder-member of the Institut International de Musique (with Gounod, Chabrier, Reyer and others) and president of the Société des Compositeurs de Musique.

CORMAC NEWARK

Jonckers, Goessen [Gosse] (fl first half of the 16th century). Netherlandish composer who may be identifiable with MAISTRE GOSSE.

Jones, Arthur Morris (b London, 4 June 1889; d St Albans, 12 April 1980). English ethnomusicologist, missionary and theologian. He studied theology at Oxford (BA 1921, MA 1928) and took an education diploma in London. From 1923 he worked as a missionary in Africa, for over 20 years (1929–50) as principal of St Mark's College, Mapanza, Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia). On returning to England in 1952 he was appointed a lecturer in African music at the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London, a post he held until his retirement in 1966. He was awarded the Oxford DLitt in 1961. His main areas of study were African music and the xylophone; he also edited collections of hymns for schools in Africa. The dominant (and most controversial) theme of Jones's research was his contention that the similarities between the African and Indonesian xylophone indicate cultural diffusion between Indonesia and Africa. He pointed out significant similarities between scales, tunings, construction, musical forms and other stylistic features; and on the basis of this and other evidence he proposed the theory that at some time in the early Christian era parts of Africa were colonized by peoples of Indonesia. He has been criticized for the selection and analysis of his evidence, as well as for his view (in opposition to historical evidence) that the xylophone was introduced to Africa from Indonesia. His final work (1980) continued this theme. His more enduring theories concern African rhythmic construction, particularly interlocking drumming patterns (1934; 1943).

LUCY DURÁN/GREGORY F. BARZ

Jones, Charles (b Tamworth, ON, 21 June 1910; d New York, 6 June 1997). American composer. He studied the violin at the Institute of Musical Art in New York (1928–32) and composition under Bernard Wagenaar at the Juilliard School (diploma 1939). He taught at Mills College (1939–44), the Music Academy of the West, Santa Barbara (1949–54), the Aspen Music School (from 1951), the Juilliard School (1954–60, 1973) and the Mannes College of Music (from 1972), where he became chairman of the composition department in 1973. Jones is a prolific composer. The diatonic and neo-classical tendencies of his early works, dating from the 1930s and 40s, gave way to an increased complexity and chromaticism. All his music is marked by a keen lyrical sense and a prevalence of long melodic lines. Of the more significant compositions, the oratorio Piers the Plowman (1963) was commissioned and first performed by the Interracial Chorus of New York. The Second Symphony was written to fulfill the Copley Award of 1956 and, like several others of his pieces, was introduced at the Aspen Festival. A recording of the Sixth Quartet with the Sonatina for violin and piano was sponsored by the Ford Foundation. (EwenD)

STEVEN E. GILBERT

Jones, Daniel (Jenkyn) (b Pembroke, 7 Dec 1912; d Swansea, 23 April 1993). Welsh composer. He began to compose during his childhood and took a degree in English literature at Swansea University (BA 1934, MA 1939) before embarking on a career in music. Between 1935 and 1939 he studied at the RAM, winning the Mendelssohn Scholarship (1935) for works he had already composed whilst a pupil at Swansea Grammar School. Jones travelled extensively in Europe during these years, enriching his experience of different musical cultures and expanding his already encyclopedic knowledge of languages. During this period he belonged to an exceptionally talented group of Swansea-based artists which included the painter Alfred Janes and the poets Dylan Thomas and Vernon Watkins. Jones remained close to Thomas and their schoolyard meeting is vividly recorded by the poet in his story The Fight. Jones wrote about their relationship and its aftermath in his book My Friend Dylan Thomas; he acted as trustee to the Thomas estate and edited the complete poems. His wartime years were spent mostly as a decoder in Bletchley Park, where his linguistic abilities were put to good use. After the war ended, Jones eventually returned to Swansea where he remained until his death. He came to wider prominence when he was awarded the Royal Philharmonic Prize (1950) for his symphonic Prologue and when Thomas's radio play Under Milk Wood, with a score by Jones highlighting Welsh children's rhymes and tunes, was awarded the Italia Prize (1954).

Although essentially a traditionalist, Jones forged a highly individual path particularly through his metrical experiments, which were influenced by his understanding of patterns and symmetrical shapes in nature (he kept a microscope for noting plant structures). His complex metres juxtaposed phrases with time structures such as 7 + 6 + 5 + 4 + 3 + 2 + 7 in a manner which creates a characteristic ambiguity. His Kettledrum Sonata is a particularly fine example of this metrical complexity and he displays considerable ingenuity in writing for unaccompanied drums. While Jones was interested in folk music, he was not tied to his native Wales in this respect. His orchestral suite Dobrá niva (1956) is based on Slovak tunes noted on his travels. Jones realized that his Welshness was somehow inexplicably present in his works but that it was subconsciously so rather than deliberate. While he never worked in universities or the BBC, most of his commissions came from Welsh institutions and festivals.

He is at his most characteristic in the eight string quartets and the 13 symphonies (the first 12 of which are in or on each of the 12 pitches), which are central to his compositional outlook and which place him, like his near contemporary Robert Simpson, firmly within the British postwar symphonic tradition. They reveal a trenchant individualism and a dedication to craft wholly in keeping with the clarity of his intentions, while sharing an artistic ethos close to that of his Swansea-based colleagues. The Symphony no.4 (1954), written in memory of Dylan Thomas, is one of his finest works. A contained lyrical intensity, a readiness to adopt and develop traditional sonata structures and (in the scherzos) sheer spirit are notable features of symphonies nos.5–9. His string quartets often develop terse initial statements with great rigour and attention to detail. Lyricism is also a feature of his choral music and in a work like The Country Beyond the Stars (1958) he displays great sensitivity and practicality in writing for the choral means at hand. His basic thematic material is not always highly individual, but his working out of basic material always corresponds with what he described as a Welsh love of 'structural intricacy ... and a tendency to clothe the underlying pattern in a disguise of improvisatory effect'.

ARNOLD WHITTALL/LYN DAVIES

Jones, Della (b Neath, 13 April 1946). Welsh mezzo-soprano. She studied in London and Geneva, where she made her début in 1970 as Fyodor (Boris Godunov), later singing Olga (Yevgeny Onegin) and the Schoolboy (Lulu). In 1977 she joined the ENO, where her roles have included Cherubino, Dorabella, Handel's Sextus, Rosina, Cenerentola, Isolier (Le comte Ory), Ninetta (La gazza ladra), Isabella (L'italiana in Algeri), Suzuki and Dolly, which she created in Hamilton's Anna Karenina (1981). With Scottish Opera she has sung Hänsel, Clori (Egisto) and Donna Elvira, and with the WNO, Berlioz's Dido, Herodias, Brangäne and Handel's Ariodante. Jones made her Covent Garden début in 1983 as the Female Cat (L'enfant et les sortilèges), then sang Rosina, Melibea (Il viaggio a Reims) and Marcellina. In 1990 she sang Ruggiero (Alcina) in Geneva and Paris. Her repertory also includes Purcell's Dido, Baba the Turk, Magdalene, Monteverdi's Nero, Zerlina, Agrippina and Gluck's Armide, which she sang in Versailles in 1992. She sang Lucrezia in Berthold Goldschmidt's Beatrice Cenci in concert at Berlin (1994), and Samira in Corigliano's The Ghosts of Versailles at Chicago (1995). Her numerous recordings include several Handel operas and oratorios, Vitellia (Clemenza di Tito), Rosina and Maxwell Davies's Resurrection. She brings to all her roles a wide vocal range, a superb coloratura technique and uncommon dramatic flair.

ELIZABETH FORBES

Jones, Edward (i) (fl 1687–1706). English music printer. Between 1688 and 1697 he did much of the printing for Henry Playford. His press produced six editions of The Banquet of Music, the first two books of Harmonia sacra, and one or two of the Playford family's bestsellers, like The Dancing Master (1690 and 1695) and An Introduction to the Skill of Music (1694 and 1697). He also worked for other publishers and ultimately became King's

Printer. He had his premises at the Savoy in London. (Humphries-SmithMP)

MIRIAM MILLER

Jones, Edward (ii) ['Bardd y Brenin'] (b Llandderfel, Wales, bap. 29 March 1752; d London, 18 April 1824). Welsh harper, historian and composer. He left Merionethshire to start a career in London in 1774 or early 1775; he was a skilful harper and had a strong interest in Welsh poetry and customs. Fanny Burney noted in her diary in May 1775 that he had a fine instrument but that although he played with neatness and delicacy his performance lacked expression. He soon established himself as a player – in the Bach-Abel concerts, for example, for which he composed many dances and songs – and as a teacher of the harp in aristocratic circles. From about 1788 (with the publication of his Three Sonnets Now Most in Vogue at Paris) to 1820 he styled himself variously 'Harper' or 'Bard' to His Royal Majesty the Prince of Wales, a title he subsequently changed to 'The King's Bard' (or in Welsh 'Bardd y Brenin'). His compositions are contained in some 38 publications. His sonatas, marches and popular dances, which with only two exceptions are for harp or solo keyboard, are derivative and undistinguished, but his technical facility is apparent from them and particularly from his Musical Remains (1796), arrangements of compositions by Handel, J.C. Bach, Abel and others. He clearly had some success as a composer of drawing-room songs, publishing a variety in English, French and Italian, while his interest in the characteristics of the music of other nations is shown in his collections of national airs (of Malta, Holland, Sweden, Switzerland and others). His Lyric Airs (1804) contains a long and careful essay on the origin of music in ancient Greece.

It is for his work as a historian and recorder of Welsh music that Edward Jones is significant. In Musical and Poetical Relicks of the Welsh Bards (1784), The Bardic Museum (1802) and Hên Ganiadau Cymru (1820) he published 209 different melodies, most of them Welsh. He gathered them from manuscripts in the homes of the gentry and tune books of harpers and fiddlers; some were sent to him by his numerous correspondents and some he noted from oral tradition. Among the tunes are display pieces for the harp, usually in the form of variations, and dance tunes. Jones was also the first to print Welsh words to Welsh folksongs: three appear in the 1784 volume and there are six more in the second edition (1794), including such favourites as 'Ar hyd y nos' ('All Through the Night') and 'Nôs Galan' ('Deck the Halls'). Some of these were undoubtedly sung in the Welsh style called canu penillion (see WALES, II, 3(I). In the introduction to Relicks (2/1794) Jones writes:

> There are several kinds of Pennill metres, that may be adapted and sung to most of the following tunes; and some part of a tune being occasionally converted into a symphony. One set of words is not, like an English song, confined to one tune, but commonly sung to several.

Although most of the pieces in Edward Jones's collection probably originate no earlier than the 18th century some have an older pedigree. Among these is a transcription of the tablature 'Caingc Dafydd Brophwyd' in the Robert ap Huw manuscript, as well as tunes copied from 16th-century manuscripts no longer extant or mentioned in musical treatises of the same period.

Besides bearing the cost of publishing, in elegant folio editions, important works on his nation's music and its bardic tradition, Jones encouraged Welsh poets and musicians to develop their arts through the competitive eisteddfod. He adjudicated harp-playing competitions, often putting up the prizes himself, beginning at Corwen and Bala in 1789. His collection of rare books, manuscripts and musical instruments, sold by auction in 1824 and 1825, fetched about £800.

Jones, Edward (iii). See STEPHEN, EDWARD.

Jones, Edward German. See GERMAN, EDWARD.

Jones, Elvin (Ray) (b Pontiac, MI, 9 Sept 1927). American jazz drummer. As a member of Billy Mitchell's quintet at the Bluebird club in Detroit he accompanied the national jazz artists who were regularly featured there. In 1956 he moved to New York, where he began to establish a reputation as a dynamic drummer in the tradition of Art Blakey. Among the most notable groups and individuals with whom he recorded or performed at the time were J.J. Johnson's quintet, Donald Byrd's quintet, Harry Edison, Bud Powell, Sonny Rollins and Stan Getz.

In 1960 Jones became a member of the John Coltrane Quartet, beginning a five-year association that was to become one of the most significant in jazz history. The innovative performances and recordings of this African American group, led by Coltrane at the height of his powers, established the standard for excellence in the modal, open-form style of this period. During his years with Coltrane, Jones emerged as the premier jazz drummer of the 1960s, and brought his unique style to a state of maturity which irrevocably altered the nature of jazz drumming.

When Coltrane decided in 1966 to add a second drummer (Rashied Ali) to his ensemble, Jones, who found the arrangement incompatible with his musical ideas, left the group and joined Duke Ellington's orchestra briefly for a tour of Europe. He worked there for a short while before returning to the USA, where he formed a series of trios, quartets and sextets, occasionally in conjunction with Coltrane's former bass player Jimmy Garrison, and has continued to pursue an active performing and recording career. In 1979 he was the subject of a documentary film, Different Drummer: Elvin Jones.

Jones's style is a logical extension of the bop approach established by Kenny Clarke and Max Roach and modified by Art Blakey, but with the fundamental role of the drummer changed from that of an accompanist to one of an equal collaborative improviser. Jones played several metrically contrasting rhythms simultaneously, each of which was characterized by irregularly shifting accents that were independent of the basic pulse. Of particular note is his ingenious mixture of playing irregularly accented minim, crotchet, quaver and semiquaver triplet subdivisions over an extended period as a means of generating a wide array of polyrhythms. An excellent example of this technique may be heard on 'Nuttin' out Jones' (on the album Illumination, 1963, Imp.), recorded by the Jones-Garrison Sextet. In addition Jones shaped the background counter-rhythmic motifs associated with bop drumming into extended coherent musical statements with a logical internal development of their own (a classic example is on 'Part 1: Acknowledgement' on Coltrane's A Love Supreme, 1964, Imp.).

Jones's techniques resulted in dense percussive textures characterized by greater diversity of timbre, heightened polyrhythmic activity and increased intensity and volume. Moreover, as the richness of these composite textures made it difficult to discern the basic pulse, they contributed to the development of a new style of 'free improvisation' which underplayed or dispensed with regular pulse altogether (as on Coltrane's Ascension, 1965, Imp.). The salient aspects of Jones's style were adopted by many avant-garde drummers of the late 1960s and the 70s. Ultimately his innovations gave the drummer a broader role in ensemble playing, as a collaborative improviser and as the principal architect of large-scale, organically evolving percussive textures, while removing the emphasis from his function as a timekeeper.

OLLY WILSON

Jones, George (Glenn) (b Saratoga, TX, 12 Sept 1931). American country singer and songwriter. Born into a rural working-class family, he began performing in his teens, but it was not until his discharge from the Marines after Korea that he began to think of music as a possible career. He had his first hit in 1956 with Why, baby, why?, and three years later achieved his first country number one with White Lightning, written by J.P. Richardson (the 'Big Bopper'). In the early 1960s he received several awards, and later in the decade his many successes included Burn the honky tonk down and Good Year for the Roses. From 1969 to 1975 he was briefly and stormily married to Tammy Wynette, working with both her and the producer and songwriter Billy Sherrill. Despite a personal life of excess, living most of country music's clichés, his career continued to bring him further hits in the 1980s, including the award-winning He stopped loving her today. He also recorded duets with such diverse artists as Linda Ronstadt, Emmylou Harris and James Taylor, and renewed his musical partnership with Tammy Wynette.

Regarded as the greatest of the honky-tonk singers, his work reflects a wide range of country music influences, from the music of his youth in East Texas to the performers Bill Monroe, Roy Acuff and Hank Williams. Jones's life is embodied in his work: he has stated that 'you have to live country before you can sing it'. Whether through simple story-telling or through his more emotionally manipulative lyrics, his songs invite the listener into his confidence, while his voice employs a wide range of mannerisms to make drama out of the commonplace.

LIZ THOMSON

Jones, Dame Gwyneth (b Pontnewynydd, 7 Nov 1936). Welsh soprano. She studied at the RCM and in Siena, Zürich and Geneva. Engaged as a mezzo at Zürich in 1962, she made her début as Annina (Der Rosenkavalier). After singing Lady Macbeth for the WNO, she joined the Royal Opera in 1963, singing Lady Macbeth and Octavian on tour. Established as a soprano, she made her Covent Garden début in 1964 as Leonore, then sang Leonora (Il trovatore), Elisabeth de Valois, Santuzza, Desdemona, Donna Anna, Aida, Tosca, Salome, Chrysothemis, the Marschallin and Sieglinde. The last of these was her début role at Bayreuth (1966), where she also sang Eva, Kundry, Elisabeth/Venus, Senta, and Brünnhilde in the 1976 Centenary Ring, which appeared on videotape and disc. Jones sang regularly at the Vienna Staatsoper, in Munich, Paris, Milan, San Francisco, Chicago and the Metropolitan, making her début in 1972 as Sieglinde. Her later repertory included Isolde, Ortrud, the Empress and the Dyer's Wife, Helen (Die ägyptische Helena), Strauss's Electra, Turandot, Minnie, and Woman in Erwartung. Her strong, vibrant lirico spinto soprano and handsome stage presence, together with total emotional and dramatic involvement in her roles, gave tremendous excitement to her performances. Her voice could, though, develop an uncomfortable beat under pressure, especially in later years; and this often detracts from the value of her recordings. She was created DBE in 1986.

ALAN BLYTH

Jones, Inigo (b London, bap. 19 July 1573; d London, 21 June 1652). English architect and stage designer. He was the son of a London cloth worker; he was probably educated as a painter, and was given considerable stimulus by journeys abroad, to France, Germany and Italy (?1598–1601) and to Copenhagen in 1603. He entered royal service in 1604 when Queen Anne commissioned him to design the scenery for masques. He was festive decorator to the Earl of Salisbury (1606–9) and 'surveyor' to the Prince of Wales, designing his tournaments (1610–12). In 1613 he staged three royal wedding masques in London. After nearly two years in Italy, he became Surveyor of the King's Works in September 1615 to James I, an appointment confirmed by Charles I in 1626: Jones thus became responsible for the royal building (including the Banqueting House, 1619–22, where masques were performed, and the Cockpit-in-Court Theatre, 1629–31, in Whitehall) and for the staging of court festivities and theatrical performances.

Stage design by Inigo Jones for the proscenium (frontispiece) and flats for the masque 'Florimene', performed at Whitehall, London, 1635: pen and ink drawing (Devonshire Collection, Chatsworth)

Jones was the most important architect of the English Renaissance and at the same time had a crucial influence on the theatre of the Stuart court. Between 1605 and 1640 he was involved with over 40 productions as stage and costume designer, machinery operator, director and co-author; his (often polemically opposed, but nonetheless fruitful) collaboration with the dramatist Ben Jonson, with the composers Alfonso Ferrabosco (ii), John Coprario, Robert Johnson (ii), Thomas Campion, Lanier, and William and Henry Lawes, and with choreographers, influenced the masque's development as a theatrical form. The masque, as the Stuarts' means of self-portrayal, depicted their claim to absolute power with primarily visual imagery, marked by Platonic hypostasization. Jones's most important tool was the perspective stage, which ensured an integrated visual effect; after experimenting with the periaktos system (1605, Oxford) he designed his own apparatus which illustrated the central theme of the masque, the transformation of chaos into the divinely sanctioned, absolute order, first using a machina versatilis (a wall, painted on both sides, rotating on a central pivot), then (possibly by 1611) with a scena ductilis (horizontally mobile pieces of scenery, flats and shutters, which ran along grooves in the floor). This transformation scene, perfectly displayed in a design for the anonymous pastorale Florimene (1635; see illustration), was complemented with a scene of relief in the background, and an upper stage suspended above it with a flying gallery for cloud effects and apotheoses (first used in Jonson's Chloridia, 1631). He was iconographically close to Giulio Parigi's stage designs for Florentine intermedi and opera productions. His costume sketches, drawn in a free, spontaneous style, were largely based on models by Jacques Callot, as well as on contemporary iconologies (Ripa) and costume books (Vecellio). His stage art carried English music theatre to its first peak, and helped prepare the ground for its achievements during the time of Purcell and Handel.

MANFRED BOETZKES

Jones, Jo(nathan) (b Chicago, 7 Oct 1911; d New York, 3 Sept 1985). American jazz drummer. He grew up in Alabama, and toured as an instrumentalist and tap-dancer with various carnival shows. In 1934 he began his long association with Count Basie. He left Basie briefly in 1936 to join Walter Page in the Jeter-Pillars Orchestra in St Louis, but by the end of the year both musicians had returned to Basie's group. When the guitarist Freddie Green replaced Claude Williams in 1937, Basie's celebrated four-member rhythm section was complete, and soon became the most outstanding and influential of its time (see BASIE, COUNT, §2). Jones appeared in the film Jammin' the Blues in 1944. Apart from a period in the army (1944–6), he remained with Basie until 1948, when he began a varied and active freelance career with many mainstream jazz musicians, revealing an uncommon mastery of swing and modern drumming styles. In 1947 he made the first of several tours with Jazz at the Philharmonic; the organization took him to Europe a number of times and led to his recording with such musicians as Billie Holiday, Teddy Wilson, Duke Ellington, Johnny Hodges, Lester Young, Art Tatum and Benny Goodman. Later he performed and recorded on many occasions in groups modelled on Basie's 'Kansas City' ensembles.

Jones is generally credited with transferring the basic pulse in jazz from the bass drum to the hi-hat, which he left slightly open to produce a light, continuous sound unlike the staccato ideal of earlier jazz drumming. This novel technique, which was fully developed by the time he made his first recordings with Basie in 1936, among them Shoe Shine Boy (Voc.), completely revolutionized the timbre of the jazz rhythm section, making it more subtle and responsive to solo improvisation than had earlier been the case. Recordings with Basie, notably Swingin' the Blues (1938, Decca), also show that he had conceived of the jazz pulse as four evenly stressed beats in a bar, thus helping to establish the four-beat jazz that characterized the later swing period; late in life he recorded The Drums (1973, Jazz Odyssey), giving a uniquely detailed demonstration of swing percussion techniques. By concentrating the pulse in the hi-hat, Jones freed his other instruments for irregular accents such as the rim-shots and bass drum bombs for which he became famous (ex.1). He was also among the first jazz drummers to realize the full potential of the brushes, which he used with remarkable facility. Though not given to long solos in the manner of his contemporaries Chick Webb, Gene Krupa and Cozy Cole, Jones was an expert soloist; his varied phrase lengths, free handling of the bass drum and avoidance of auxiliary instruments such as woodblocks and cowbells foreshadowed future developments in jazz drumming. As adapted by Kenny Clarke and other drummers of the bop school, Jones's innovations became an integral part of modern jazz.

J. BRADFORD ROBINSON

Jones, Joe (b New York, 19 June 1934; d Wiesbaden, 9 Feb 1993). American composer, artist and instrument builder. Brought up in Brooklyn, he attended the Hartnett School of Music in Manhattan and studied composition with Earle Brown. In the late 1950s he was a student in Cage's experimental music class at the New School for Social Research. Associated with Fluxus, an international avant-garde art movement, he became famous for his kinetic sculptures, which range from single instruments to mechanical orchestras.

Jones built his first automatic mechanical musical instruments in 1962. Fluxorchestra consisted of self-playing whistles, reeds, horns, violins, bells, gongs and other instruments; Mechanical Violin (1968) used both traditional instruments, toys and other suspended objects driven by electric motors. Several of Jones's smaller instruments were included in 'Fluxus Yearboxes', mass-produced collections of Fluxus art, music and other materials. These sometimes contained short film-strips called 'Fluxfilms' that could by seen through eye viewers. Several films by artists such as Jones, Yoko Ono and Mieko (Chieko) Shomi are minimalist, slow-motion depictions of everyday activities. In Smoking (Fluxfilm no.18), for example, Jones exhales smoke from a cigarette. In 1969 Jones opened the Music Store in Manhattan, a shop in which his self-playing mechanical instruments could be activated by visitors or passers-by. Several Fluxus events featuring John Lennon and Yoko Ono took place in this venue. Jones left New York in 1972, eventually settling in Wiesbaden. A retrospective exhibition of his work was held at the DAAD Galerie, Berlin in 1990.

DAVID W. BERNSTEIN

Jones, John (b ?London, 1728; d London, 17 Feb 1796). English organist, harpsichordist and composer. He became organist of the Middle Temple in London on 24 November 1749, of the Charterhouse (following Pepusch) on 2 July 1753, and of St Paul's Cathedral (following Greene) on 25 December 1755. He was elected a member of the Royal Society of Musicians in 1750, and was also appointed Vicar Choral at St Paul's in 1757. In a misleading statement, the English Musical Gazette (1 January 1819) commented unfavourably on his ability as a cathedral musician: 'Jones . . . appears not to have been worthy of the situation, for he was not capable of doing the duty for a length of time after the appointment: and as he could not play from score he employed himself in arranging the Anthems in two lines'. As Shaw points out, 'from the seventeenth century, all English organists used skeleton scores on two staves'. Jones retained all three organists' positions until his death, when he was buried in the Charterhouse cloister. He is frequently mentioned in the Recollections of R.J.S. Stevens, who in 1768 auditioned to become a pupil of Jones, but as the terms were 'so exorbitant . . . my father declined the matter altogether'. Stevens eventually became a temporary deputy of Jones at the Charterhouse, for which he was paid 2s. 6d. for a month's work. In 1786 Jones applied to the governor of the Charterhouse for the vacant position of 'Register', but was refused because of his lack of legal training. According to the chapel register, Jones married Sarah Chawner at Sudbury, Derbyshire, and their children were baptized at the Charterhouse from 1785. A Thomas Jones was apprenticed to him in 1764.

Jones's vocal music consists of a few solo songs and a collection of 60 chants (1785), one of which was sung at George III's state visit to St Paul's on 23 April 1789 and at many of the annual meetings of the Charity Children; Haydn attended the latter in 1791, and noted the melody of the chant (no.24 of the double chants) in his diary, adding: 'In my whole life nothing has moved me so deeply as this pious and innocent music'. In 1836 Crotch based a keyboard fugue on another chant by Jones.

Jones published three volumes of harpsichord music, Eight Setts of Lessons in 1754 and a further two volumes in 1761. The subscription list for the 1761 sets contains nearly 300 names including Abel, Avison, Boyce, Burney, Camidge and Nares. Handel's influence is apparent, but it is his orchestral music rather than his harpsichord music which is a source of Jones's inspiration. Jones's writing is often vigorous and dramatic and his keyboard style is generally eclectic. His movements are frequently longer than those of his contemporaries, especially in his later works, which show an increasing awareness of the galant style.

It is doubtful whether this Jones was the composer of the set of harpsichord and violin sonatas published in 1782, but more probable that he was a sub-director of the Handel Commemoration (1784). Another John Jones is listed in Mortimer's London Universal Directory (1763) as a violinist in His Majesty's Band.

GERALD GIFFORD

Jones, Kelsey (b South Norwalk, CT, 17 June 1922). Canadian composer and harpsichordist of American birth. He studied at Mount Allison University (Sackville, New Brunswick), at the University of Toronto, where his teachers included Ernest MacMillan, Healey Willan, Leo Smith and others, and in Paris with Boulanger. After teaching for a brief period at Mount Allison, during which time he founded and conducted the St John's SO (1950–54), he was appointed to a post at McGill University, where he taught until his retirement in 1984. Among his other musical activities, he co-founded the Baroque Trio of Montreal (1955–73), an ensemble that commissioned many new works (including his Sonata da camera, 1957 and Sonata da chiesa, 1967) as well as performing early music. As a teacher, Jones was particularly respected for his approach to counterpoint, an important characteristic of his relatively conservative compositional style. (EMC2, C. Ford)

Jones, Martin (b Witney, 4 Feb 1940). English pianist. He studied the piano with Guy Jonson, Gordon Green and Guido Agosti, and composition with Lennox Berkeley. While a scholar at the RAM, he won many prizes, including the Dame Myra Hess Award in 1968, the year of his recital débuts in London (Queen Elizabeth Hall) and New York (Carnegie Hall). Jones was pianist-in-residence at Cardiff University from 1971 to 1988, and his discography includes complete cycles of the solo works of Brahms, Mendelssohn, Debussy, Grainger, Szymanowski and Stravinsky, and the piano sonatas of Alan Hoddinott. A pianist of exceptional refinement and facility, he has also recorded much of the Spanish repertory, including works by Falla, Albéniz, Granados, Turina and Mompou.

BRYCE MORRISON

Jones, Philip (b Bath, 12 March 1928; d London, 17 Jan 2000). English trumpeter. He studied with Ernest Hall at the RCM from 1944 to 1948. His first appointment was at Covent Garden (1948–51), where he was probably the only trumpeter to have performed Wagner's Ring both on the bass trumpet and as principal trumpeter in consecutive seasons. He was subsequently principal trumpeter with nearly all the major London orchestras, including the RPO (1956–60), the Philharmonia (1960–64), the LPO (1964–5), the NPO (1965–7) and the BBC SO (1968–72). He was also a freelance player, and, in 1967–8, a manager. In 1951 he formed the Philip Jones Brass Ensemble, which soon consisted of two basic formations: a quintet (two trumpets, horn, trombone and tuba) and a ten-piece group, for the larger concert halls in Germany, the USA and Japan. The ensemble, which disbanded in 1986, gained world renown, with numerous recordings and first performances, and was widely emulated. Jones was head of the wind and percussion department of the RNCM, 1975–7, and of the GSM, 1983–8; from 1988 to 1994 he was principal of Trinity College of Music. He was made an OBE in 1977 and a CBE in 1986.

EDWARD H. TARR

Jones, Quincy (Delight) (b Chicago, 14 March 1933). American producer, arranger, composer and entertainment entrepreneur. He was raised by his father and stepmother in Seattle from the age of ten, and learned various brass instruments before settling on the trumpet. He performed in dance bands with early musical associates including Charlie Taylor, Bumps Blackwell and Ernestine Anderson, and at 14 met the 16-year-old Ray Charles, with whom he formed a lifelong friendship and from whom he first received instruction in jazz harmony and arranging. While in high school, Jones performed with Billie Holiday and Billy Eckstine, and studied the trumpet with Clark Terry. He studied briefly at Seattle University and at the Berklee School of Music, Boston, but left to tour. He first toured Europe and made his first recordings while with Lionel Hampton, playing a solo on the 1951 recording of his own composition, Kingfish.

Jones left Hampton's band in 1953, settled in New York and began working as an arranger for Tommy Dorsey, Count Basie and Hampton, among others. From Gigi Gryce and Billy Taylor, Jones learned to publish his own music. He also led and recorded his own big bands, and in 1956 served as musical director and trumpeter for Dizzy Gillespie's US State Department tour of the Middle East and South America. The next year he moved to Paris as a producer, arranger and conductor of the 55-piece orchestra at Barclay Records. While in France, Jones studied composition and orchestration with Nadia Boulanger and attended seminars given by Pierre Boulez and Jean Barraqué. In 1959 he was the music director of the ill-fated tour of Harold Arlen's blues opera, Free and Easy; after closing in Paris in February 1960, Jones toured Europe and recorded with the show's orchestra.

In 1961 Jones returned to New York and became the director of artist and repertory and a record producer for Mercury Records, then vice president (1964), the first black artist to progress so high in a major record company. That year, Jones arranged and conducted for Frank Sinatra with the Count Basie Orchestra, and completed his critically acclaimed film soundtrack for The Pawnbroker. In 1965, he left New York and Mercury Records to write for Hollywood, completing soundtracks including The Slender Thread (1966), In the Heat of the Night (1967) and In Cold Blood (1968), for which he won the Oscar for Best Original Score. In 1978, while working on the film of the musical The Wiz, Jones first met singer Michael Jackson with whom he later made pop music history with global sales of over 45 million of Thriller (1984), followed by Bad (1987).

Jones also enjoyed considerable success with his television soundtracks particularly 'Ironside' (1967), 'Sanford and Son' (1972), 'The Bill Cosby Show' (1974) and 'Roots' (1978). His most notable pop records, from Walking in Space (1969) to From Q with Love (1999), all capture his signature mix of infectious dance tunes, roof-raising gospel, and smooth ballads that have been popular over some 40 years. In 1985, his song We are the World raised millions of dollars for African famine relief.

Drawing on his experience as a record company executive, arranger, producer, and his formidable power in the entertainment industry, Jones began the record label Qwest (1980). The label gained an eclectic roster of over 20 artists whose styles range through hip hop, rock and roll, rhythm and blues, jazz and gospel. His entrepreneurial interests grew to include publishing Vibe magazine as a barometer of hip hop culture in 1984. In 1991, he formed Quincy Jones Entertainment Co., a joint partnership with Time Warner Enterprises, a division of Time Warner Inc., to produce television programmes including 'Fresh Prince of Bel Air'. In 1993, Jones teamed with Tribune Broadcasting and several other partners to form Qwest Broadcasting. QDE, his partnership with David Salzman, further expanded their multimedia communications enterprise to include cable television networks and radio stations.

Quincy Jones's unparalleled achievements as a multimedia entertainment entrepreneur often overshadow his talents as an arranger and composer. He exhibited a personal arranging style for jazz orchestra as early as 1953, particularly in his chordal use of fourths in arrangements for Clifford Brown. Jones has had a profound impact on American popular music by infusing it with contemporary jazz orchestra arrangements with small group conceptual approaches. The indelible influence of French musical sensibilities is also apparent in his writing, ranging from the film score to The Pawnbroker, to his television soundtrack for 'Roots'. Particularly salient is Boulanger's urging for Jones to 'explore the potential of [his] own people's music, all of it'. In his film scores, Jones writes for almost every instrument, from solo voice to symphony orchestra, from finger snaps to jazz big band and African percussion ensemble. His compositional approach involves a diversity of influences that wed the western European concert tradition with West African and black American music traditions: the overture to 'Roots', for example, is scored for symphony orchestra with West African percussion and flute, while the following section features synthesizer, West African percussion and vernacular chorus.

ANTHONY BROWN

Jones, Richard (b late 17th century; d London, 20 Jan 1744). English composer and violinist. Hawkins refers to him as Dicky Jones, and tells us that in about 1730 he succeeded Stefano Carbonelli as leader of the orchestra at Drury Lane, though he may have been playing in the orchestra before that date. Among his violin pupils was Michael Christian Festing. He played in a concert at York Buildings on 13 March 1728, and on 30 November 1731 he shared a benefit with the actor-singer James Excell (fl 1730–41) at the Sun Tavern. His association with Drury Lane may have begun as early as 1723, when a masque, Apollo and Daphne, by 'Jones' was performed there; it was adapted in 1725 as a pantomime with songs by Henry Carey.

Of Jones's stage works, the overture from The Miser, or Wagner and Abericock, a short, spirited Handelian Allegro, and 18 tunes, probably from the same work, survive in a keyboard reduction.

His Suits or Setts of Lessons for keyboard (1732) are irregular in construction, with no.1 containing two toccatas, no.2, two gigues, and no.6, 12 movements in four different keys. His style in general is violinistic in character and basically italianate, but it is outstanding for its originality. The music is rhythmically vigorous, containing rapid scale passages and wide leaps, which suggest that he may have known some of Domenico Scarlatti's sonatas. Movements often develop unexpectedly with new ideas extending their length far beyond normal expectations. The violin music shows him to have been an accomplished violinist. The Chamber Air's consists of eight suites or sonatas of either three or four movements each; they are full of double stops, wide leaps, cross-string figuration and florid ornamentation. All except one of the suites or sonatas begin with a preludio, five of which contain decorative cadenza-like passages, described by Jones on the title-page as 'being written (chiefly) in the Grace Manner'. The six suites of the second set are simpler and more regular in construction. Each begins with a vigorous preludio, followed by four dances in every case but one. No.6 is tonally odd in having two movements in B minor paired with three in A. As in the keyboard suites the development of the musical material is quite unpredictable.

RICHARD PLATT

Jones, Robert (i) (*fl c*1520–35). English church musician and composer. He became a Gentleman of Henry VIII's Chapel Royal between 1511 and 1520, and appears as such until about 1535; he had left by 1545. Thomas Morley listed him as one of the 'practitioners' whose works he had consulted when writing his Plaine and Easie Introduction (1597). Two five-part works have survived, each lacking its tenor part, in the Peterhouse Partbooks (GB-Cu Peterhouse 471–4); these are a Magnificat (ed. N. Sandon, Moretonhampstead, 1993) and a Mass Spes nostra (bass also in GB-Lbl Add.34191; ed. N. Sandon, Moretonhampstead, 1999).

The alternatim polyphony composed for the Magnificat adheres to the standard English pattern in form and mensuration, and the missing tenor has been reconstructed from diagnosis of its use of the faburden of the 1st tone as a cantus firmus. Unusually for a five-voice work, certain verse sections are written for four voices. The cantus firmus of his Mass Spes nostra is an antiphon for Matins on Trinity Sunday. Jones's compositional style sometimes lacks finesse and assurance, admitting some unwonted dissonances and infelicities of contrapuntal technique; nevertheless, it shares in such virtues of contemporary English composition as rhythmic vitality and cogency of design. His three-part song Who shall have my fair lady was included in the anthology XX Songes (RISM 1530[6]), but only the bass part survives. (See also AshbeeR, vii; BDECM.)

ROGER BOWERS

Jones, Robert (ii) (fl 1597–1615). English composer. He graduated BMus at Oxford in 1597. In 1600 he published the first of his five books of lute-songs, and in 1601 contributed a madrigal to The Triumphes of Oriana (RISM 1601[16]). His single collection of madrigals is dated 1607. On 4 January 1610 Jones, together with Philip Rosseter, Philip Kingham and Ralph Reeve, was granted a patent to 'practice and ex'cise in the quality of playing [a group of children] by the name of Children of the Revells of the Queene within the white ffryers', and on 31 May 1615 the four men were permitted to build a theatre for these children on the site of Jones's house near Puddle Wharf in Blackfriars. However, objections were raised by the civic authorities, who successfully petitioned the Privy Council for the demolition of the nearly completed building.

Although Jones's five books of ayres all belong to the early years of the 17th century, they reflect only faintly and very occasionally the heightened expression that some other English composers were already exploring. Indeed, certain features of Over these brookes from his second collection (1601), such as its grave manner, imitative lute preamble and general leisureliness, are more redolent of the viol-accompanied solo song. Jones issued the entire contents of his first collection in alternative versions for four voices; yet despite the employment of some melodic points which were clichés of the canzonet, the restrained manner of these songs seems more akin to that of the pre-madrigalian English partsong. In general Jones avoided particularized expression, except of the most obvious kind, such as the bird noises in Sweete Philomell.

In his second collection he intermittently essayed a more pathetic vein, but the results are feeble when compared to the models that Dowland offered him. In the prefatory material of his first volume Jones stated: 'ever since I practised speaking, I have practised singing', and the strongest feature of his best songs is the felicitous union of the text with attractive melody. On the whole Jones's simplest songs are the best, for when he ventured to expand he frequently encountered serious difficulties with the accompaniment, the harmonic structure faltering or losing a purposeful direction, and the lute part becoming sketchy with the linear implications of the accompaniment being left badly incomplete. At times Jones seems harmonically almost illiterate, though it is clear that some of the crudities arise from the large number of printer's errors that fill all Jones's publications. In fact, Fellowes suggested that a hack must have devised some of Jones's lute parts.

With such obvious blemishes Jones gave ample material to his critics, and he clearly suffered some strong censure, as is revealed by his bitter 'greeting' to 'all musicall murmurers' at the beginning of his fourth collection of songs (1609). This collection, like the third (1605, entitled his Ultimum vale), includes duets as well as solo songs; in both collections some of the solo songs appear in alternative four-voice arrangements while others occur in solo versions only. The fourth book contains a varied selection of poetic texts, incorporating both serious and humorous poems, and the collection concludes with two Petrarch settings in which Jones attempted a more up-to-date italianate manner, demonstrating how deficient was his grasp of even a remotely monodic style. In his final book (1610; the contents appear solely as solo songs) Jones turned back towards the type of simple ayre that had dominated his earlier collections, but the freshness that had characterized the best of these is now almost entirely lacking.

Only the cantus and bassus books of Jones's single madrigal volume have survived, though nine pieces from it exist complete in manuscripts. Jones modelled his style on the Morley canzonet, and he appears to have handled this most successfully in the six three-voice works (these are among the incomplete pieces). Jones's technical limitations prevent him maintaining the few attractive ideas he does display, and these works leave an overall impression of unskilful mediocrity.

DAVID BROWN

Jones, Robert Edmond (b Milton, NH, 12 Dec 1887; d Milton, 26 Nov 1954). American designer. He graduated from Harvard University (1910), where he remained for two years as an instructor. On a trip to Europe (1913–14), he was much influenced by Max Reinhardt in Berlin, Jacques Coupeau in Paris, and by the work of Adolph Appia and Jaques-Dalcroze at Hellarau. He returned to Europe in 1922 with Kenneth Macgowan; they recorded their impressions in Continental Stagecraft (New York, 1923). With Lee Simonson (1888–1967) and Norman Bel Geddes, Jones was responsible for introducing a 'new stagecraft' to America: the fusion of acting, lighting and setting into a dramatic whole. His output over 25 years was prodigious and wide-ranging. His designs for The Man who Married a Dumb Wife (1915) for Harley Granville-Barker are said to be the first important, indigenous expression of the new stagecraft and his Macbeth (1921) for Arthur Hopkins created a sensation for its use of expressionism.

Jones designed the first American productions of Schoenberg's Die glückliche Hand (1930), Berg's Wozzeck (1931) and Stravinsky's Oedipus rex (1931), all in Philadelphia, and the première of Douglas Moore's The Devil and Daniel Webster (1938, New York). Designs for his last production, Der fliegende Holländer (1950; see illustration), were realized by Charles Elson at the Metropolitan on the occasion of Hans Hotter's début as the Dutchman. Jones's unity of craft elements with a unique style was never a formula but a constant endeavour to realize the rhythm of each production. A simplified realism and poetic use of light were his trademarks. 'When I go to the theatre, I want to get an eyeful,' he wrote.

Jones, Shirley (b Charleroi, PA, 31 Mar 1934). American actress and singer. Her career as a singing actress on film and television began with starring roles in two Rodgers and Hammerstein film adaptations: Laurie Williams in Oklahoma! (1955) and Julie Jordan in Carousel (1956). Subsequent films included April Love (1957), Never Steal Anything Small (1959), Elmer Gantry (1960) and Two Rode Together (1961). She won an Academy Award as best supporting actress for her portrayal of a prostitute in Elmer Gantry, but it was the wholesome 'girl next door' which was the typical Jones character. In 1962, she played prim and proper librarian, Marian, in The Music Man opposite Robert Preston. From 1970 to 1974, she co-starred in the television series 'The Partridge Family' with her stepson, the singer and actor David Cassidy, in which she portrayed the widowed mother of a singing family, thus having the weekly opportunity to showcase her vocal abilities, albeit in a soft rock idiom somewhat distinctive from the Broadway style which established her career. She has continued to perform into the 1990s and is still in great demand.

Jones possesses a well-trained versatile voice that she has been able to adapt to any of the roles and personas she has pursued throughout her career. With a technique verging on the operatic, she has demonstrated an amazing ability to avoid the pitfalls of oversinging, and so is able to effectively portray the type of character adored by Americans.

WILLIAM A. EVERETT, LEE SNOOK

Jones, (James) Sidney (b London, 17 June 1861; d London, 29 Jan 1946). English composer. His father, J. Sidney Jones (1838–1914), studied at Kneller Hall and was a military bandmaster before settling in Leeds and becoming musical director at the Grand Theatre and, from 1887 to 1902, conductor of the Harrogate Municipal Orchestra. The younger Sidney assisted his father in Leeds, played the clarinet in his orchestras and later took to conducting. He was spotted by the theatre producer George Edwardes, and first made his name as a composer with the song 'Linger longer, Loo' for the burlesque Don Juan (1893). As conductor at the Prince of Wales Theatre he wrote the music for A Gaiety Girl (1893), an early musical comedy; it was followed by other stage works, of which The Geisha (1896) achieved enormous success not only in Britain but throughout Europe, where its popularity exceeded that of any other British operetta, including The Mikado.

Later works could not rival this success, although San Toy (1899) almost did so in London. Belonging to the older comic-opera school, Jones resented the extraneous interpolations that were increasingly a feature of London musical productions of the time and struck out on his own. The musical comedy The Medal and the Maid (1903) and the comic opera My Lady Molly (1902) were agreeably free from such interpolations but achieved less success. The latter especially showed Jones's substantial abilities in the light-opera tradition of Sullivan, German and Liza Lehmann, and Jones was sufficiently fond of the work to revise it later. In 1905 he became conductor at the Empire Theatre, London, and composed some ballets. He also composed music for further musical plays, but after The Happy Day (1916) he went into retirement, feeling out of tune with changing tastes in the popular theatre. His unassuming nature was reflected in his works, particularly The Geisha, which is full of charming numbers, its opening chorus in particular being worthy of Sullivan. His works as a whole contain admirably crafted ensembles and concerted finales, offsetting the music-hall-style numbers that the taste of the time demanded. Jones's brother Guy (1874–1959) wrote music for the musical play The Gay Gordons (1907) as well as songs and arrangements.

Jones [née Joyner], (Matilda) Sissieretta ['Black Patti'] (b Portsmouth, VA, 5 Jan 1868/9; d Providence, RI, 24 June 1933). American soprano. From the age of 15 she studied singing in Providence, Rhode Island, and later studied privately in Boston at the New England Conservatory, and with Louise Capianni and Mme Scongia in London. On 5 April 1888 she made her début at Steinway Hall, New York, in a Bergen Star Concert. From 1888 to 1895 she toured the USA, Canada, Europe and the West Indies as a soloist, attracting national attention with her well-publicized appearances at the Grand Negro Jubilee at Madison Square Garden and the White House in 1892, and at the Pittsburgh Exposition and the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893. From 1896 to 1915 she was the leading soloist of Black Patti's Troubadours, a vaudeville company managed by Rudolf Voelckel and James Nolan, and she toured internationally with this company, performing staged 'kaleidoscopes' of arias and choruses from grand opera. Her repertory also included art songs and sentimental ballads. She was greatly admired for the richness and power of her voice as well as her musicality and technique. Collections of memorabilia concerning Jones are in the library of Howard University, Washington DC, and the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.

JOSEPHINE R.B. WRIGHT

Jones, Spike [Lindley Armstrong] (b Long Beach, CA, 14 Dec 1911; d Los Angeles, 1 May 1965). American musical satirist, bandleader and drummer. He played the drums from the age of 11, and by 1937 was a studio drummer in Hollywood. During the late 1930s and early 40s, while playing with radio bands, he began burlesquing songs by adding unusual percussion sounds such as tuned cowbells, washboards, tuned doorbells, automobile horns, pistols and anvils; there was soon a demand for his special sound effects in radio studios. In 1942 he formed his own band, Spike Jones and his City Slickers, and achieved prominence with a recording for Walt Disney's satirical cartoon Der Fuehrer's Face. Thereafter he wrote songs and arranged well-known tunes with his outrageous instruments, adding insecticide spray-guns in E♭, a live goat trained to bleat on cue in the key of C and a 'latrinophone' harp made of catgut and a lavatory seat. From 1947 he toured with his band for several years in his Musical Depreciation Revue. His most popular recordings date from the late 1940s and 1950s, and include Chloe, You always hurt the one you love, Cocktails for Two (with a chorus of hiccups), The Glow-Worm and All I want for Christmas is my two front teeth. The band performed frequently on television in the 1950s, appeared in several films, and in the 1960s made a number of dixieland jazz recordings.

Jones achieved international prominence as the 'King of Corn' for his sentimental tunes, his rollicking parodies of intimate lovesongs, and a style of musical humour based on unexpected and sometimes bizarre aural and visual effects. His greatest success came in a period when naiveté was cultivated in popular music and when extravagant elements, a legacy of vaudeville, still provided much material for the entertainment media.

Jones, T(revor) A(lan) (b Sydney, 18 Dec 1932). Australian musicologist. He graduated from the University of Sydney (BA 1954, MA 1959) and studied at the New South Wales Conservatorium (1949–55); he continued studies at Harvard University (1955–6), with Thurston Dart in Cambridge (1956–8) and with Herbert Howells at the Royal College of Music (1957–8). After five years as senior lecturer at the University of Western Australia (1960–65), he became foundation professor in 1965 at Monash University, Melbourne. He served on the UNESCO Advisory Committee for Music, the Australian Institute of Aboriginal Studies' Ethnomusicology Committee (1964–76), and the ABC Music Advisory Committee (1966–9). He retired in 1988. In the early years of his ethnomusicological research he worked with A.P. Elkin on indigenous Northern Australian music and became acquainted with the didjeridu, an instrument which he learnt to play himself and which he has described in minute detail, comparing it with similar non-Aborigine instruments. He has always strongly advocated including ethnic music in general education and developed a research plan for this purpose.

WERNER GALLUSSER/R

Jones, Tom [Thomas John Woodward] (b Treforest, nr Pontypridd, 7 June 1940). Welsh popular singer. He performed as a semi-professional rock and roll singer then the songwriter Gordon Mills became his manager (1964) and chose the stage name Tom Jones to capitalize on the recent success of a film version of Henry Fielding's novel. During the second half of the 1960s he became one of the most well-known singers in Europe and North America. He was an exciting performer with a powerful but controlled tenor and a tone described by one critic as 'redolent of burnished brass'. He drew his repertory from country music (Porter Wagoner's Green Green Grass of Home) and soul (She's a lady) as well as pop (It's not unusual, by Mills and Les Reed) and film themes (Bacharach and David's What's new, pussycat? and Thunderball by John Barry and Don Black). His later career focussed on cabaret and television appearances in the USA although he recorded Matador (1987), the score of a projected stage show and took part in Sir George Martin's recording of Dylan Thomas's Under Milk Wood (1990). He also collaborated on record with Van Morrison, producer Trevor Horn and the Welsh rock singer Cerys Matthews who in 1998 recorded a tribute song, The Ballad of Tom Jones, with the group Space. DAVE LAING

Jones, William (i) (b Lowick, Northants., bap. 20 July 1726; d Nayland, Suffolk, 6 Jan 1800). English curate, composer and writer. From 1740 to 1745 he was educated at the Charterhouse, where J.C. Pepusch was organist and teacher of singing. During this period he was also a private cello pupil of James Oswald. From 1745 to 1751 he continued his music studies privately at Oxford, where he learned about Rameau's doctrine of fundamental bass from an 'old Italian Master … who later published a treatise' (probably Giorgio Antoniotto). Subsequently, he held various appointments as curate, including the perpetual curacy of Nayland, 1777–98, where he composed music and wrote on the philosophy and theory of music. That he also played the organ appears from remarks in his anonymously published Observations in a Journey to Paris by Way of Flanders, in the Month of August 1776 (London, 1777). From 1775 he was a Fellow of the Royal Society.

Jones was a zealous opponent of the deists, dissenters, republicans and 'levellers', seeing in these and other groups a challenge to the established high church and government. His convictions also appear in his belief that music is the gift of God; that man is a musical instrument of God's forming; and that the proper end of music is to serve the establishment and improve the understanding. But Jones developed these beliefs by recourse to unorthodox tenets of the Hutchinsonians, a school of British anti-Newtonians who developed a modified Cartesian philosophy. Rejecting Newton's vacuum, action-at-a-distance and inertial motion, Jones explained material phenomena by the efflux of an 'electric ether' supposed to be composed of particles of fire, light and air and, hence, to be an emblem of the Trinity. His indefatigable efforts to promote this cosmological doctrine gained him the nickname 'Trinity Jones', and led Thomas Twining to state that Jones was 'tinctured with some prejudices very unphilosophical for a Philosopher'.

In his 1780 essay, 'Of Taste', Jones argued that 'tripartite' principles in music are found also in painting, architecture and mind. In his 1781 philosophical treatise, Jones included a chapter of eight sections devoted to the physics, mathematics and theory of music, in which he described his improved aeolian harp for illustrating that musical sound is caused by 'the intervention of some cause more moveable and more powerful than the air itself', namely, the electric ether. And in his 1784 treatise on music, he expounded an aesthetic of unity in variety based on a machine theory of matter in motion: variety results from combinations and permutations of musical elements (matter), whereas unity results from temporal isochronism and commensurability (motion). Hence, Jones preferred the music of the 'ancient' (chiefly Baroque) school, which fitted his cosmological doctrine more closely than that of the 'modern' (Classical) school.

JAMIE C. KASSLER

Jones, Sir William (ii) (b London, 28 Sept 1746; d Calcutta, 27 April 1794). English lawyer, orientalist and Sanskrit scholar. He was the son of a distinguished mathematician who came from a peasant family on Anglesey. He was educated at Harrow and University College, Oxford, and early showed an extraordinary gift for languages. In 1766 he became tutor to the seven-year-old Lord Althorp, only son of the 1st Earl Spencer, and for five years had access to a superb library. He engaged in much activity in literary circles and knew Dr Johnson, Burke, Gibbon and scholars and associates of the Enlightenment, including Rousseau. He developed his orientalist pursuits and at the age of 22 translated the history of Nadir Shah into French for King Christian VII of Denmark. He was called to the Bar in 1774, and in 1783 received a knighthood and was appointed High Court Judge in Calcutta, where he remained for the rest of his life.

In Calcutta, Jones pursued his study of oriental languages. In 1784 he founded the Asiatic Society of Bengal, which for over a century provided the focus for the study of the languages, literatures, history and customs of the Indian subcontinent. Jones included Francis Fowke's valuable article 'On the Vina or Indian Lyre' in the first volume of Asiatick Researches (Calcutta, 1788). His one published essay on Hindu music is supported by his intimate knowledge of Sanskrit and his exceptionally enquiring mind and shows both sympathy and insight. Further insights into Jones's pursuit of his interest in Indian music come in the correspondence of Margaret Fowke, a musical amateur in Calcutta who collected Indian tunes. Jones assisted her by translating lyrics and in return received copies of the melodies that she collected; a volume of these 'Hindostannie' airs was presented to Warren Hastings, who commented on their authenticity: 'I have always protested against every Interpolation of European Taste in the Recital of the Music of Hindostan'; he was able to 'attest that they are genuine Transcripts of the original music'. However, any effort to 'translate' Indian tunes into a European notation was doomed to failure and the results, to judge by the extant examples (see India, §II, 5), bore only a distant resemblance to anything authentically Indian.

Indian music was only one of many subjects that Jones pursued during his residence in India; his thorough and confident observations formed the groundwork for generations of future scholars. Jones's wide-ranging talents were recognized in his lifetime and received high praise from such a figure as Goethe.

PETER PLATT/IAN WOODFIELD

Jong, Marinus de. See DE JONG, MARINUS

Jongen, (Marie Alphonse Nicolas) Joseph (b Liège, 14 Dec 1873; d Sart, 12 July 1953). Belgian composer, organist and pianist. At the age of seven he enrolled as a student at the Liège Conservatoire, where he later studied composition with the director, Jean-Théodore Radoux. In 1892 he joined the organ class of Charles-Marie Danneels, and was awarded the gilt medal unanimously and with the highest honours at the organ competition of 1896. In 1894 he gained first prize for his String Quartet op.3 in the competition of the Royal Academy of Belgium, and three years later he won the Prix de Rome with the cantata Comala.

Jongen became organist of the Grand Séminaire, Liège, in 1891, a post he relinquished three years later to become the organist at St Jacques, Liège. From 1898 he shared this post with his brother, LÉON JONGEN, in order to undertake a four-year tour of Europe. In Berlin he encountered the music of Brahms and met Bruch and Richard Strauss, whom he heard direct the first performances of Ein Heldenleben and Don Juan. For a short time Strauss gave him composition lessons, but in 1899 Jongen moved on to Bayreuth, where it was proposed that he should become chorus master for the 1900 season. Complex Bayreuth politics eventually put paid to the plan, and instead he visited Munich, where he wrote his Violin Concerto. The Exposition Universelle of 1900 attracted him to Paris, where he became acquainted with Fauré, d'Indy, Charles Bordes and many others connected with the Schola Cantorum and the Société Nationale. Six months in Rome, where he established a friendship with Florent Schmitt, concluded his travels.

By 1905 Jongen had taken up residence in Brussels. He taught at the Scola Musicae there, a counterpart of d'Indy's Schola Cantorum, and also at the Liège Conservatoire, where he became professor of harmony in 1911. He married in 1909 and with the outbreak of war in 1914 his family fled to England, where they lived alternately in London and Bournemouth. With Defauw, Emile Doehaerd and Tertis he formed a piano quartet, the Belgian Quartet, and he performed regularly as organist and pianist.

After World War I Jongen returned to Brussels. In 1920 he was appointed professor of fugue at the Brussels Conservatory and five years later he became its director. During this time he was principal conductor of two concert series in Brussels, the Concerts Spirituels and the Concerts Populaires, and he accepted the royal command to become tutor in harmony to Princess Marie-José. He retired in 1939 but continued to compose and assisted in the design of the organ of the Belgian Radio. Jongen was twice elected to the office of director of the Royal Academy of Belgium and was a corresponding member of the Institut de France.

Jongen is remembered above all for his organ music, especially the Sonata eroïca and Symphonie concertante (with orchestra), which have become enduring works of the repertory. His chamber music, however, includes many brilliantly coloured works such as the later trios and the Concert à cinq. The Pièce symphonique for piano and orchestra rivals the Symphonie concertante, while the compositions for solo piano range from the simplest of miniatures to the Trois études de concert written for Brailowsky. There are also concertos for piano and harp, settings of Baudelaire, a ballet and an unfinished opera, though Jongen himself valued the Prélude élégiaque et scherzo.

Léon Jongen's assertion that his brother should not be grouped with the school of César Franck serves to emphasize that Jongen's independence allowed him to draw on a much broader legacy from the 19th century. Wagner, Schumann, Mendelssohn and Chopin, for instance, served equally as his mentors, although the influence of plainsong and Walloon folksong was of more fundamental significance. The tuition of Strauss and d'Indy allowed him to consolidate a hybrid style that was described by one critic as revealing 'a comprehension of the world'. Absorbing much from Debussy, he began a period of 'painting with sonority', and the music of the 1920s went further in assimilating the influence of Stravinsky. Jongen's more abstract late music evolved as a result of his spiritual affinity for Fauré's music. Thus his manner is noteworthy for its unique eclecticism, which Jongen himself preferred to think of as internationalism.

JOHN SCOTT WHITELEY

Jongen, (Marie Victor Justin) Léon (b Liège, 2 March 1884; d Brussels, 18 Nov 1969). Belgian composer and pianist, brother of JOSEPH JONGEN. He studied at the Liège Conservatoire and was joint organist of St Jacques, Liège (1898–1908). Thereafter he toured Europe with a piano quartet and settled in Paris, becoming accompanist to the tenor Imbart de la Tour. In 1913 he won the Belgian Prix de Rome with the cantata Les fiancés de Noël. He toured South America, and after World War I he visited north Africa. In 1925 he began a period of nine years in East Asia, and became conductor of the Tonkin Opera, Hanoi (1927–9). On his return to Belgium he was appointed professor of fugue at the Brussels Conservatory, where he succeeded his brother as director (1939–49). He was elected to the Royal Academy of Belgium in 1945 and was also a member of the Royal Academy in London. In 1956 he became co-director of the Chapelle Musicale Reine Elisabeth, and in 1963 his Violin Concerto was set as the test piece for the competition of this organization.

Jongen's operatic works reveal his fiery temperament; his choral writing adroitly points the irony of the texts, some drawn from La Fontaine. Travel recollections led to the Ravel-like exoticism of such orchestral works as Malaisie, and the Sept esquisses for piano show how close Jongen was to French Romanticism. However, the song cycle Provinciales reveals the more eccentric, mischievous side of his personality.

Jongleur (Fr.). A medieval entertainer and in specifically musical contexts a minstrel. According to most lexicographical authorities the word was extremely rare before 1500 and seems to be the result of a conflation of two separate Old French words, joglëor and janglëor. Joglëor derives from the Latin joculator, as do the cognate Old Provençal joglar and the modern English 'juggler'.

The medieval word covers a whole category of professionals including specific instrumentalists and even storytellers. Within this final group may sometimes be found the janglëor or jangleur, which literally means 'liar', 'gossip' or 'prattler': in this case he would presumably be one who earned his living by the use of his sharp tongue, but in general the word was one of disparagement with no implications of professionalism and gave rise to the word janglerie (approximately, 'rubbish'). The fusion of the two words seems to have happened in the 15th century: by the 16th century the word jongleur had become standard in French and was used in the modern sense by Jean Lemaire de Belges and Rabelais. In common parlance today the jongleur tends to be considered more of a freelance musician than the minstrel whose name implies some official household position. See MINSTREL; GUILDS..

DAVID FALLOWS

Jonson, Ben (b London, 1572 or 1573; d London, 6 Aug 1637). English dramatist, masque librettist and poet. Among his contemporaries he was second in repute only to Shakespeare. The son of a Scottish minister, he was educated at Westminster School where his master was the famous antiquary and classical scholar William Camden. His comedies owe much to Plautus and Terence, his epigrams to Martial, his odes and lyrics to Horace. Not a university-trained man, he was in mid-career given honorary MA degrees by both Oxford and Cambridge.

Best known as a dramatist, Jonson wrote plays from about 1598 to the early 1630s for a variety of London theatrical troupes. Many of his early comedies are studded with elegant lyrics in the tradition, on the one hand, of the refined songs of the choirboy theatre of the 1580s and yet, on the other hand, clearly allied to the moral and instructive songs appearing in the late Tudor morality plays and interludes of the popular tradition. Illustrative of the former are the many songs artfully woven into plays such as Cynthia's Revels (1600) and Poetaster (1601). In later comedies acted by adult companies the continuing sophistication is evident in the surviving settings, virtually all by contemporaneous composers of stature: Alfonso Ferrabosco (ii) for Volpone (1606), Robert Johnson (ii) for The Devil is an Ass (1616), William Lawes for a Caroline revival of Epicoene (first produced in 1609) and Nicholas Lanier (ii) for The Sad

Shepherd (*c*1630). By contrast the folk and ballad tunes included in Eastward Ho (written in collaboration, 1605) and in Bartholomew Fair (1614) show that Jonson kept his finger on the pulse of popular taste, and he did so throughout his career.

Jonson made an even greater use of songs and instrumental music in his entertainments and masques, most of whose librettos depend for their effectiveness on exquisitely fashioned lyrics celebrating kings and princes in a high Renaissance style. The entertainments at Highgate (1604) and at Welbeck (1633), for example, show Jonson as a kind of Poet Laureate for James I and Charles I respectively; in the first he collaborated with the madrigalist Martin Peerson, in the second with William Lawes.

As a librettist Jonson's chief claim to fame rests on his development of the masque: he wrote more than 25 court masques between 1605 and 1631. He greatly lengthened the fable, or plot, beyond the brief prologue speeches of early Tudor times, expanded the cast of mythological and allegorical personages, varied the metrical shapes and contours of the lyrics and significantly amplified the overall design by the introduction of an antimasque or two to complement the main masque. Thus he elaborated the form from a simple plotless pageant to a complex symbolic drama in which the ideal and its opposite could be seen and measured against each other.

For none of his masques has a complete vocal score been preserved, yet the pieces that do survive give a good idea of what transpired musically at any given stage in his career. The popularity of his masques is demonstrated by the large number of dances in virginal, lute and lyra-viol prints and manuscripts up to the mid-17th century. Ferrabosco composed highly dramatic settings for nearly all of the early masques, and his Ayres (1609) include pieces for The Masque of Blackness (1605), The Masque of Beauty (1608), The Haddington Masque (1608) and The Masque of Queens (1609). GB-Ob Tenbury 1018 contains settings by him for Oberon (1611) and Love Freed from Ignorance and Folly (1611). In the second decade of the century Lanier was reported in the libretto of Lovers Made Men (1617) to have set and sung the entire masque 'in stylo recitativo', a piece which for some critics – largely because it excludes the principal masque role of the royal resolver – may justly be regarded as the first English opera, and he probably also composed the recitative items so described in The Vision of Delight (1617). Expense accounts record that Lanier sang in The Gypsies Metamorphos'd (1621), and in the libretto of The Masque of Augurs (1622) Jonson praised both him and Ferrabosco as 'that excellent pair of kinsmen' who composed the music. A few years later William Webb composed a setting of a lyric apparently intended for Jonson's Neptune's Triumph (1624) or The Fortunate Isles (1624). GB-Lbl Add.10444, an extensive repository of dance-tunes from Jacobean masques compiled by Sir Nicholas L'Estrange, possibly in the late 1620s, contains masque and antimasque dances for the following masques by Jonson: Hymenaei (1606), Beauty (1608), Queens (1609), Oberon (1611), Love Freed (1611), Lovers Made

Ex.1 Anonymous contemporary setting for lyric vii of A Celebration of Charis, GB-Lbl Add. 56179, f.24*r*

Men (1617), Pleasure Reconcil'd to Virtue (1618), News from the New World (1620), The Gypsies Metamorphos'd (1621) and Augurs (1622). Music for his masques also appears in Brade's Neue ausserlesene liebliche Branden (1617) and Adson's Courtly Masquing Ayres (1611).

Besides the songs appearing in dramatic contexts Jonson included in his collections of poetry verses that on occasion attracted the composers of his day. For Under-Wood there survive settings of rare beauty by Ferrabosco for Heare me O God and The Hour-Glass. Lesser-known pieces include the lively two-part dialogue setting by an anonymous composer for The Musical Strife (in GB-Ob Don C.57), and John Wilson's setting for The Dream (Mus.Sch.B.1). Recently identified is an attractive anonymous setting for cantus and bassus (GB-Lbl Add.56179, f.24*r*) of his 'verses of a kiss' (ex.1), a lyric that contains a few verbal variants of the version appearing as part vii of A Celebration of Charis (Herford and Simpson, viii, 139–42). These were the verses about which the poet William Drummond of Hawthornden reported in Ben Jonson's Conversations (ibid., i, 134–5) that Jonson, when he visited Drummond in 1619, consistently repeated – the text begins 'but kisse me once' – and even sang informally. This setting may well have been composed by Robert Johnson, who had also set part iii of that sequence. The Jonson song that ranks highest in popular esteem is Drink to me only with thine eyes; the earliest and most famous setting, which is anonymous, dates from the 18th century.

The most celebrated operatic adaptation from Jonson's plays is the libretto that Stefan Zweig wrote for Richard Strauss: Die schweigsame Frau (1935, Dresden), after Epicoene, or The Silent Woman (1609), a play which had also inspired Salieri's Angiolina (1800). Another play, Volpone, or The Fox (1605–6), was the source for operas of the same title by Norman Demuth (1949), George Antheil (1953) and Francis Burt (1960). Elgar, at the time of his death, was planning an opera to be called The Spanish Lady, derived from Johnson's The Devil is an Ass (1616), with lyrics from other Jonson plays and poems added to the libretto. Jonson's verse also appears in the arias and choruses of Vaughan Williams's Sir John in Love (1929).

ANDREW J. SABOL (with ARTHUR JACOBS)

Jónsson, Thórarinn (b Mjóifjörður, 18 Sept 1900; d Reykjavík, 7 March 1974). Icelandic composer and teacher. He received his earliest musical training in a small farming community in eastern Iceland, studying the organ and the violin. In 1923 he received a state grant to study the violin with Thórarinn Guðmundsson in Reykjavík, also taking lessons in theory with Ernst Schacht and Páll Ísólfsson. In 1924 he moved to Berlin, where he studied theory and counterpoint with F.E. Koch and Paul Haydenreich. He later became a renowned teacher in Berlin, where his students included members of the Berlin PO. From 1941 until the end of World War II he was in charge of propaganda radio broadcasts from Germany to Iceland on behalf of the German authorities, but his political affinities during the Nazi era have yet to be fully documented. Olympia, a work for chorus and orchestra, appears to have been written for the Olympic games held in Berlin in 1936. Many of his compositions were destroyed by fire in Berlin at the end of the war. After returning to Iceland in 1950 he was an active member of the Icelandic Composers Society and was elected an honorary member in 1961.

He wrote in a late Romantic idiom, influenced by Brahms, Grieg and Reger. His works are characterized by solid craftsmanship and contrapuntal mastery; though often highly chromatic, they never venture beyond the limits of tonality. A gentle lyricism pervades his songs and chamber works, while his larger works for chorus and orchestra are written in a more powerful, dynamic style.

Jooss, Kurt (b Wasseralfingen, 12 Jan 1901; d Heilbronn, 22 May 1979). German dancer and choreographer. See BALLET, §4.

Joplin, Janis (Lyn) (b Port Arthur, TX, 19 Jan 1943; d Hollywood, CA, 4 Oct 1970). American rock and blues singer and bandleader. Having performed in bars around Texas and California, she moved to San Francisco in 1966 and joined Big Brother and the Holding Company, with whom she recorded two albums. In 1968 she formed the Kozmic Blues Band and two years later the Full Tilt Boogie Band, making one album with each. Her stardom rested solely on her singing style, rather than on her abilities as a songwriter or guitar player like most of her male counterparts in the late 1960s. She clearly modelled her style after blues and rhythm and blues singers such as Bessie Smith and Otis Redding, unlike the more folk-influenced vocal approach favoured by other popular white female singers of the era. Joplin conveys an emotionalism more extreme than that of her models, giving the illusion of abandoning any vestiges of vocal control, especially in live performances. The idea of her performances as completely uninhibited was reinforced by her hard-living, hard-drinking image which she emphasized on stage and in interviews. Her four albums display increasing vocal refinement from the all-out, larynx-shattering performance of Ball and Chain (on Big Brother and the Holding Company's Cheap Thrills, Col., 1968; also captured in the film Monterey Pop, 1967), to the carefully nuanced build-up in her most commercially successful single Me and Bobby McGee (on Pearl, Col., 1971; recorded with the Full Tilt Boogie Band). Joplin's career was riddled with contradictions: she was labelled the first 'hippy poster girl', yet claimed by progressive writers as a proto-feminist for her assertive performing style, extrovert public persona and status as a bandleader. Another contradiction surfaces in the contrast between her 'one of the boys' image and that of Joplin as a 'victim', an image promoted by the tales of suffering outlined in many of her songs and by reports of her personal life.

DAVID BRACKETT

Joplin, Scott (b northeast TX, between July 1867 and mid-Jan 1868; d New York, 1 April 1917). American composer. He is regarded as ragtime's greatest exponent. Census records of 1870 and 1880 and Joplin's death certificate establish that the frequently cited birth date of 24 November 1868 is incorrect.

1. Life. Joplin was the child of a former slave and a free-born black woman and grew up in the town of Texarkana on the Texas-Arkansas border. He had few early educational opportunities, but his mother took an active interest in his education, and most members of his family played musical instruments; a German immigrant musician (perhaps Julius Weiss) who taught the young Joplin also seems to have played a significant role in the formation of his artistic aspirations.

His activities during the 1880s are not documented, but anecdotal evidence suggests that he lived for a while in Sedalia, Missouri, a town later linked to his fame. He also worked as a travelling musician and became a close associate of ragtime pioneer Tom Turpin in St Louis. In 1891 he was back in Texarkana, performing with a minstrel company. In 1893 he went to Chicago during the World's Columbian Exposition and led a band, playing the cornet.

He returned to Sedalia in 1894, joined the Queen City Cornet Band (a 12-piece ensemble of African-American musicians), playing lead cornet, and formed his own dance band. He travelled with his Texas Medley Quartette, a vocal group, performing as far east as Syracuse, New York, where his first two publications were issued, the songs Please say you will and A Picture of Her Face.

Joplin attended music classes at the George R. Smith College in Sedalia, taught the piano and composition to several younger ragtime composers, including Arthur Marshall and Scott Hayden (with whom he composed collaborative rags). In 1898 and 1899 he performed as a pianist at the Maple Leaf Club (made famous by the Maple Leaf Rag) and the Black 400 Club, and formed a fruitful relationship with the publisher John Stark, who published about one-third of Joplin's known works.

Early in 1899, Joplin issued his first piano rag, Original Rags. Dissatisfied with the usual arrangement whereby publishers purchased popular music outright for $25 or less, Joplin then obtained the services of a lawyer before publishing again. This was a wise decision, for his next publication, Maple Leaf Rag, on which he had a royalty contract paying one cent per copy, was an extraordinary success, the 'King of Rags'. Its success was not immediate — only 400 copies were sold in the first year — but it sold half a million copies by 1909, thereby providing Joplin with a steady, albeit small, income. The most famous of all piano rags, The Maple Leaf Rag formed the basis of Joplin's renown and justified his title as the 'King of Ragtime Writers'.

In 1901, Joplin moved to St Louis with Belle, his new wife, and devoted his time to composition and teaching, relegating performance to a minor part of his activities. Adding to his fame through the next few years were such outstanding rags as Sunflower Slow Drag (1901, with Scott Hayden), The Easy Winners (1901), The Entertainer (1902) and The Strenuous Life (1902), a tribute to President Theodore Roosevelt.

Despite his success as a ragtime composer, his ambition was to write for the lyric theatre. His first effort in this direction was The Ragtime Dance, a ballet for dancers and singer-narrator depicting a black American ball such as those held at Sedalia's Black 400 Club. It was first staged on November 24, 1899 at Wood's Opera House in Sedalia, though it was not published until 1902. His next stage work was A Guest of Honor, an opera depicting black leader Booker T. Washington's dinner in the White House with President Theodore Roosevelt in 1902. Joplin applied for a copyright in February 1903 and took the opera on tour with his company of 30 the following August. Early in the tour the receipts were stolen and the company disbanded. The score was never published and has been lost.

A notable rag of 1904 was his The Cascades, performed at the St Louis World's Fair (for the photograph used on the sheet music see illustration). Another was The Chrysanthemum, dedicated to Freddie Alexander, whom Joplin married in June 1904. She died the following September and was the dedicatee of his next opera, Treemonisha.

In 1907, by which time he had published more than 40 works, mostly rags, Joplin moved to New York with the intention of finding a publisher for his second opera, on which he was still working. Within his first year in New York he befriended, helped and encouraged Joseph F. Lamb, a young white man who was to become one of ragtime's greatest composers. Joplin left his longtime publisher Stark and tried several New York firms, finally choosing Seminary Music, with which he published such piano pieces as Wall Street Rag (which includes a descriptive narrative of events in the famed financial district), Paragon Rag (dedicated to the Colored Vaudeville Benevolent association, of which he was a member), Solace (a syncopated non-rag subtitled 'A Mexican Serenade'), and Pine Apple Rag. Seminary Music was linked to, and shared an office with Ted Snyder Music, where Irving Berlin was employed at the beginning of his long career. It was through this connection, Joplin maintained, that Berlin had access to the score of Treemonisha, from which he supposedly stole a theme for use in his hit song Alexander's Ragtime Band.

Scott Joplin, c1903

Joplin completed Treemonisha in 1910 and, after failing to find a publisher willing to issue the score of some 250 pages, published the score himself in May 1911. The score received a very favourable review in the American Musician and Art Journal in June 1911, and soon afterwards Joplin announced several stagings, but none reached fruition. The only known performances during his lifetime were an unstaged run-through without scenery or orchestra in 1911, a staging of only the final number in Bayonne, New Jersey, in 1913, and an orchestral performance in 1915 of the ballet from act 2, 'Frolic of the Bears'.

The last work Joplin saw in print was his Magnetic Rag (1914), which he issued with his own publishing company, formed with Lottie Stokes, his third wife. He continued composing almost to the end of his life, including more stage works and orchestral music, but the manuscripts remained unpublished and were apparently destroyed in 1961.

2. WORKS. Joplin was the pre-eminent composer of piano ragtime. Working primarily in a popular idiom, he strove for a 'classical' excellence in his music and recognition as a composer of artistic merit, rather than one simply of popular acclaim. Although he lavished much of his creative efforts on extended works, it was with his piano rags – miniatures rarely exceeding 68 bars of music – that he attained greatness. Both he and Stark referred to these pieces as 'classic rags', comparing their artistic merit to that of European classics. The comparison is not unwarranted, for Joplin clearly sought to transcend the indifferent and commonplace quality of most ragtime. This aim is evident in his comments regarding his music, in his plea for faithful renderings of his scores and – most of all – in the care and skill with which he crafted his compositions. Joplin's rags, unlike those of most of his contemporaries, are notable for their melodically interesting inner voices, consistent and logical voice-leading, subtle structural relationships and rich chromatic harmonies supported by strongly directed bass lines. These qualities are all apparent in Rose Leaf Rag, where Joplin also replaces the traditional ragtime bass pattern with an original figure. Throughout his music Joplin reveals himself as a composer of substance.

A renewed interest in Joplin's music began in the early 1940s, though such interest remained limited until the ragtime revival of the 1970s, when most of his works were reissued, performed and analysed; Treemonisha was lavishly staged and recorded. Public acclaim and official recognition came in the form of a posthumous Pulitzer Prize in 1976 and a commemorative postage stamp in 1983.

EDWARD A. BERLIN

Jora, Mihail (b Roman, 2/14 Aug 1891; d Bucharest, 10 May 1971). Romanian composer. He studied theory and solfège with Teodoreanu at the Iaşi Conservatory (1909–11); at the Leipzig Conservatory (1912–14) with Teichmüller (piano) and with Krell and Reger (counterpoint and composition); and in Paris (1919–20) with Schmitt (composition) and other private teachers. As a pianist, conductor and critic he served the cause of Romanian music after World War I; he was founder-chairman of the Society of Romanian Composers (1920) and music director of the Romanian Broadcasting Corporation (1928–33); and in his position as professor of harmony, counterpoint and composition at the Bucharest Conservatory, he fostered the development of a contemporary Romanian school. In 1955 he was elected to the Romanian Academy and in 1969 he received the Herder Prize. As a composer he was the first 20th-century Romanian to concern himself extensively with ballet and with songs, two genres well suited to his preference for illustrative music. His songs are composed in a folk style, their melodies based on the intonation of spoken Romanian, and they achieve vivid expression through turns of harmony, melody or rhythm. The ballets are richly polyrhythmic and full of melodies taken from the Romanian peasantry or gypsy bands, harmonized with oriental, Tatar or Romanian folk formulae. Jora's chamber music shows him to be a master of miniature form, and closer to neo-classicism than elsewhere in his oeuvre. The orchestral works have affinities with German romanticism and with French impressionism, but remain essentially Moldavian in spirit. His collected essays were published as Momente muzicale (Bucharest, 1968).

VIOREL COSMA

Jorda, Enrique (b San Sebastián, 24 March 1911; d Brussels, 18 March 1996). American conductor of Spanish birth. After studies at San Sebastián and Madrid University, he went to the Sorbonne in Paris, initially to study medicine, but soon changed to music and studied harmony and composition with Le Flem, the organ with Dupré and conducting with Rühlmann, making his début as a conductor in Paris in 1938. He returned to Spain and became conductor of the Madrid SO, 1940–45, then of the Cape Town SO, 1948–54, and the San Francisco SO, 1954–63, a posting which was marred by controversy. He later served as conductor of the Antwerp PO, 1970–76, and the Euskadi SO, San Sebastián (1982–4). Jord also toured widely as a guest conductor, appearing with the BBC SO and the LSO, as well as in Central and South America and in Australia. He gave the first performances of symphonies by Milhaud (nos.8 and 12) and Roy Harris (no.8), and of Rodrigo's Fantasía para un gentilhombre (1954) with Segovia. His recordings, mostly issued during the 1950s, include the finest early LP version of Falla's Noches en los jardines de España with Clifford Curzon. He received the Spanish honour of Comendador del Orden de Alfonso el Sabio, and wrote a book, El director de orquesta ante la partitura (Madrid, 1969).

Jordá (y Gascón), Luis (Gonzaga) (b Barcelona, 1869; d Barcelona,1951). Mexican composer, pianist and conductor. He was born in Catalonia but spent most of his career in Mexico City, settling there after directing a season of zarzuelas at the Teatro Principal in 1898. He founded the periodical El arte musical (1910) and the Jordá-Rocabruna Quintet (1903), which played an important role in introducing chamber music to the Mexican capital. He was also a founder-member of the Sociedad Mexicana de Autores. A leading figure of the Mexican musical renaissance, he devoted most of his energies to composing zarzuelas and was highly successful. Among the most notable of his works in this genre are Chin chun chan (a 'Chinese conflict' in three acts), El sueño de un loco, and La buena moza, all of which received their first performances at the Principal in 1904. He was also successful in other genres, and in 1902 his Himno patriótico won first prize in a national composition contest. His symphonic poem Independencia also won first prize in a later contest commemorating the centenary of Mexico's independence (the jury included Ponce, Felipe Pedrell and Widor). He composed numerous piano works, and his mazurka Elodia was among the bestselling scores in 19th-century Mexico. His vocal works include the popular Ardientes desvaríos and Amar y sufrir.

WALTER AARON CLARK

Jordan (i), Hashemite Kingdom of (Arab. Al-Mamlaka Al-Urduniya Al-Hashemiya). Constitutional monarchy in West Asia. Located in the centre of the eastern Arab world, Jordan has an area of 91,860 km² and a population (est. 2000) of approximately 6·33 million, of which some 96% are Sunni Muslim. Through population movements and common geographical features, Jordan has close cultural and musical links with the neighbouring Arab cultures of Syria, Palestine, Iraq and Saudi Arabia.

Jordanian music is primarily vocal. Instruments are used to accompany singing or sometimes to reproduce songs instrumentally (although through acculturation instrumental music has recently gained some importance). Folk or folk-related genres predominate. Before the 1948 war with Israel, Jordan's small towns were mostly populated by agriculturalists; artisans and shopkeepers were not numerous. Following the unification of the West Bank and East Jerusalem under Jordanian rule after the 1949 Jordan-Israel armistice, Palestinian folk and art traditions became a part of the kingdom's traditions (see PALESTINIAN MUSIC). Jordanian Islamic chants reflect a trace of Ottoman influence from Mevlevi and other Sufi orders. A small Christian population (mainly adherents of the Greek Orthodox Church) has its own religious music. Secular music-making has developed in various ways according to influences from folk music, Arab art music, classical Western music and Western dance and popular music.

1. History. 2. Folk music: (i) Bedouin music (ii) Town and village music. 3. Musical instruments. 4. Contemporary music.

1. HISTORY. The Jordan region has been inhabited since ancient times. Excavations at 'Ayn Ghazal, near Amman, provide evidence of ancient collective communities, some of which developed to become cities. Among these was Rabbat 'Amon ('the house of 'Amon', from which Amman derives its name), a strong fortress at the time of Joshua (*c*1250 BCE). A Jewish tribe named Banū Jād intermarried with the Ammonites and worshipped their gods (Ba'al, Ashtarot, Kamosh and Malkom). Girls of the Banū Jād used to dance around altars and ritual stones (nuṣb) and sing sensual lyrics to the accompaniment of frame drums and the shawn (a double-reed instrument).

The wall paintings of Negev (*c*2000 BCE) provide the earliest recorded evidence of music and dance in Jordan. They represent four dancing figures and musicians playing the drum and kithara (kinnara). Their dance resembles the dabka still traditionally performed today (see §2(ii) below) and could have been a dance of fertility. Stamping the ground and hand-clapping seem to have been signs of joy for the Ammonites; they are reported to have done this when the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar II destroyed Jerusalem in 597 BCE.

The Nabataeans (*c*500–106 BCE) are the most famous people of ancient Jordan. Their territory extended as far as Damascus and Palmyra in modern Syria, and their capital at Petra (then known as Sala'a) was a natural fortress with buildings chiselled into the colourful mountain rockface. When he visited there, the Greek geographer Strabo recorded that two musicians entertained the king's guests. During the Christian era, many Arab tribes converted to Christianity, as did the Nabataeans. Numerous churches were built throughout Jordan, and new rituals and ceremonies were developed. The Orthodox Church still uses some modes similar to Arab maqāmāt, and Byzantine and Greek influences are also evident in the liturgical chants.

After the rise of Islam, the Umayyad caliphs and princes (661–750) cultivated music and invited the famous singers of Medina and Mecca to their capital at Damascus, giving generous rewards. They decorated their palaces, fortresses and desert rest-houses with frescoes representing musicians, singers and dancing figures. Qusayr 'Amra, an Ummayad rest-house in the east Jordanian desert, has frescoes of this type.

The Abbasids (750–1258) were great music patrons but less closely connected with the region, since their capital was at Baghdad. During the Crusades Jordan was a continuous battlefield. Little is known of the mutual musical influences between the Christian invaders and Jordanian Arabs. The Ayyubids and Mamluks succeeded in liberating the whole area around the end of the 13th century, allowing local traditions to recover and develop again. Karak, a city in south Jordan, became a centre of culture, music and poetry. The writer al-Maqrīzī describes how al-Malik al-Nāṣir of Karak visited the Egyptian ruler al-Malik al-ʿĀdil in 1238 and persuaded him to make him a gift of a harp-playing girl (jinkiyya) attached to the court. Another singing-girl called al-Karakiyya ('from Karak') was very famous in Cairo at the time of Sultan al-Muṭahhar Hājī, who was very fond of her.

The Ottomans ruled the area for over five centuries (*c*1400–1918) and were primarily concerned with the safety of the pilgrim road to Mecca, which passed through Jordan. Under British Mandate (1920–48) Jordan was influenced by Western culture and music, and the army brigade was established.

Modern history began with the arrival of Prince Abdullah (later King Abdullah) in Maʿan in 1920; he became ruler of Transjordan in 1921, the people welcoming him with songs and dances. Under King Hussein's rule (1953–99) Jordan progressed rapidly in all fields. Musical institutions were established: private and government music centres; the Department of Fine Arts at Yarmouk University; the military, police and radio/television orchestras; cultural festivals (e.g. Jarash Festival), the National Music Conservatory; and the Syndicate of Jordanian Artists. Music education was established in all schools, and foreign cultural centres invited musicians from abroad to perform in Jordan.

In February 1999, during the days of mourning after King Hussein's death, Qur'anic recitation was the sole music to be broadcast on television and radio, apart from occasional use of instrumental Western classical music. Fanfares and bagpipes were played at certain moments of the funeral.

2. FOLK MUSIC. Folksongs cover all subjects related to Jordanian life experience. There are songs for birth, marriage and death, children's songs, songs about love, lamentations, patriotic, religious and work-songs, and songs on other themes. The musics of nomadic Bedouins and of settled populations are distinct but interrelated. Following the immigration of Palestinians in about 1948, Palestinian folksongs and traditional art music spread throughout the kingdom of Jordan. Jordanian singers such as JAMĪL AL-ĀṢ, TAWFĪQ AL-NIMRĪ and ʿAbdūh Mūsā influenced the development of folk and folk-related music.

(i) Bedouin music. Bedouin songs have specific musical characteristics. Melodies are short (mostly four bars) and repetitive (repeated for every line of the poem), operating within a narrow ambitus not exceeding a 4th. The modal material known as ajnās (sing. jins) is limited to use of the tetrachords Ṣabā, Bayātī, Huzām and the Bedouin jins – C D E𝄳 F♯ G. The style is responsorial; first the leader sings, then the other participants repeat what he has sung. The songs relate to Bedouin social circumstances and use Bedouin vernacular Arabic pronunciation. Sometimes a Bedouin poet-singer sings and improvises new poems to the accompaniment of the rabāb (spike fiddle). (For further details and music examples see BEDOUIN MUSIC.)

Hjēnī. This genre comprises three bars in 4/4 metre. It has roots in the pre-Islamic hudā' (camel-driver song).

Sāmer or qaṣīd. This has a two-bar melody in 4/4 metre. A leader sings the poem, and the participants sing the following refrain: 'Halā hālā lā yā halā / Winta hinēfī yā walā' ('Halleluja, halleluja! You are a believer [in God], young man'). On happy occasions the singing accompanies a dance performed by two groups of men. It starts in a moderate tempo and develops to a lively and exciting climax when the male dancers encircle a female dancer called al-ḥāshī.

Fārida. Women sing the fārida as they accompany the bride from her parents' to her husband's home. The song's main features are the narrow ambitus (not exceeding a 3rd) and the prolongation of a particular note of the melody. The melody is composed of two parts, one of them repeated (ex.1).

Ex.1 Fārida

(♩ = 64) gliss.

Tim - sek, ʿa - lâ, ṣî - nî, tim - sek, ʿa - lâ, ṣî - nî he, he, yâ bûm - ham-med.

['Catch porcelain' (to avert evil), oh, oh father of Mohammad]

Uhzūja or ḥidā. This sort of declamatory singing is used in battles, processions and work (ex.2).

Ex.2 Uhzūja

(♩ = 82)

Hê hê, yâ, nas - la, lash - râ - fal - lâ, ni - ṣî - rak.

[Oh, oh descendant of the nobles, God be with you]

Maʿīd or ʿadīd (lamentations). Women, dressed in black, sing lamentations for the dead. Sometimes they form a semicircle and perform a slow death dance.

Tarwīda. Like uhzūja, the tarwīda comprises several sorts of songs and melodies. Women's songs include lullabies, songs for the bride's bath or henna ceremony (ex.3), and some love songs.

Ex.3 Tarwīda

[She closed her eyes and stretched out her hand to let them put henna on it]

(ii) Town and village music. The music of the sedentary population differs greatly from the music of the nomadic Bedouins. Melodies follow the form of the poem and are generally longer, with a wider ambitus; they contain some melismas, ornaments and figurations. People sing their own songs, antiphonally or responsorially, using different ajnās (tetrachords) and ʿuqūd (pentachords). They also use a variety of musical instruments (see §3 below). Occasionally a professional solo poet-singer (zajjāl or qawwāl) provides the audience with a varied repertory of songs and improvised types appropriate to the occasion.

Dabka songs. All villagers and townspeople in Jordan and neighbouring Syria, Lebanon and Palestine perform the dabka dance on joyful occasions. In the dance they stamp the ground, just as their ancient ancestors used to do at springtime to glorify the return of Dummuzi and Inanna, the deities of fertility and love. A male musician stands inside the circle of dancers playing the song tune on the shibbāba (oblique flute), mijwez or yarghūl (types of double clarinet; see §3 below). The dance leader (qawwāl) sings the verses alternately with the dancers, and instrumentalists play some interludes. The main types of dabka are 'alā dal-ōnā, 'al-yādī, ya ẓarīf aṭ-ṭūl and 'allā (ex.4). Women participate in only one variant, ḥabl muadda' ('ornate string'), so-called because each girl holds hands with dancers on either side of her in the dance circle. Melodies are of eight bars in 4/4 metre. Their ambitus is less than an octave; the most common maqām (mode) is Bayātī, and the dance-songs are performed in a lively tempo.

Ex.4 'Allā

[Oh bird who flies high, greet the girl with plaited hair—fly high!]

Improvised types. The practice of improvisation is considered to be an important feature of both traditional Arab art music and folk music. In folksinging, improvisation entails the spontaneous invention of new poems relating to the occasion and social setting. Poet-singers usually improvise to stereotyped forms such as 'atābā, mējānā, mu'annā and mawwāl (see ARAB MUSIC, §II, 3), whose melodies can be developed, altered, ornamented or slightly changed. Manipulating the melodic formation and poetic structure needs much experience on the part of the poet-singer; this is gained orally during a long period of apprenticeship.

Mu'annā is made up of four hemistichs with AABA rhyme scheme. Usually the poet sings ad libitum the first two hemistichs in the same melodic line, then the third one on a lower pitch, preparing for the high pitch of the fourth line, which has a fixed melody in tempo giusto. The following is an example:

> Allāh ma'ak yā ṣāḥibī allāh ma'ak
> Ghannī il-qawāfī fil mu'annā tasma'ak
> Ya mhājir il-khillāni dōmi 'ūd
> Fōq il-khalīqa yā wilef bidd arfa'ak
>
> (God be with you my friend, God be with you. / Sing the rhymes of mu'annā and let us hear you. / You, who left your admirers, return to them. / Then, my love, I would raise you above all creatures.)

The audience repeats the last line of the mu'annā once or twice.

Songs of Bedouin origin. Settled people have close links with the Bedouin nomads, and some are of Bedouin origin themselves. In settled communities Bedouin musical genres such as hjēnī, fārida and tarwīda are commonly performed. A type also known as sāmer combines the two traditions; it is composed of an improvised part by the poet-singer and a refrain line in tempo giusto sung by the audience: 'Yā ḥalālī yā mālī; yā rab'ī ruddū 'alayya' ('My possession, my treasure; I ask my friends to repeat after me'). The first part is of rural origin, the second is of Bedouin origin.

Songs related to the Arab art tradition. Songs within this category originate from neighbouring Arab cities such as Baghdad, Damascus, Aleppo and Cairo. Jordanian people change the melodies and words to suit their taste, or adapt the words and give them local tunes (e.g. 'Al ōf mash'al). The ZAJAL form is used in this way. The professional poet-singer (zajjāl) improvises new poems to a fixed melody. The words are in vernacular dialect; rhythms and rhymes very much depend on the melody and its cadences. Transmitted orally, the art of zajal singing requires considerable knowledge and experience.

3. MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS. The most common instrument in Bedouin society is the rabāba, a monochord bowed instrument played in a vertical position (see ARAB MUSIC, fig.6). It has a rectangular frame (20 cm × 35 cm × 6 cm) covered on both sides with skin. The neck is about 35 cm long, with a single peg at the upper end.

In Jordanian towns and villages three types of bamboo aerophone are played: shibbāba, mijwez and yarghūl. The shibbāba is a short oblique flute 35 cm in length, with six finger-holes but no thumb-hole. The mijwez is a double clarinet with bamboo pipes of equal length (about 30 cm) and six finger-holes (see ARAB MUSIC, fig.4). The yarghūl is a double clarinet with pipes of unequal length, found in varying sizes according to the tuning of different maqāmāt. The short pipe has five finger-holes, and the long one provides a drone. Both mijwez and yarghūl are played with a continuous breathing technique. Plucked instruments are sometimes available, such as 'ūd (short-necked lute) and buzuq (long-necked lute), usually imported from Egypt, Syria or Iraq. The buzuq was especially played by Gypsies; Jamīl al-Aṣ is a very good mulaḥḥin (composer of melodies for songs) and buzuq player of Gypsy origin.

The most common percussion instruments in Jordan are duff (frame drum) and ṭabla (goblet drum). In the month of Ramadan a large ṭabla or a naqqāra (small kettledrum) announces the beginning and end of the daily fast. When they dance at home, women occasionally use a sort of jingle (khilkhāl) and small finger cymbals (faqqāshāt). The mihbāsh is a beautifully carved wooden mortar and pestle originally used to grind coffee and now also used to accompany some folksongs. Rhythms are created by striking the base and walls of the hollow body with the long stick inserted through the small opening at the top.

In contemporary Jordan all the instruments of the Western orchestra, of military bands and of modern popular groups are available. The bagpipe (qirba) has become especially popular among peasants and Bedouins.

4. CONTEMPORARY MUSIC. Singers such as Tawfīq al-Nimrī used to broadcast on the radio from Jerusalem, since 'The Voice of Jerusalem' (established in 1936 under British Mandate) was the only broadcasting service available until 1959, when the Amman radio station began to operate. A group of traditional musicians formed the first ensemble of the radio station; only some could read Western notation. Others joined the ensemble later, such as Elias Faza', student of the noted Palestinian church musician Augustin Lama. The radio and (later) television popularized folk-related songs that flourished and gained success in Jordan and neighbouring Arab countries. Some songs were also produced for national occasions, to glorify Jordan or to praise the king. Traditional art music did not become popular to the same extent, although some Jordanian musicians such as Rawḥī Shāhīn, Emīl Ḥaddād, 'Amer and Mālik Māḍī and others who studied in Egypt did compose songs in traditional sophisticated forms in the 1980s.

Two composers have produced work related to Western classical styles, both using Jordanian tunes and Arab musical elements. Yūsuf Khasho (1927–96), who studied with Augustin Lama in Bayt Lahm and Jerusalem, composed several works for orchestra. 'Abdul-Hamīd Hamām (b 1943) studied composition at the Vienna Akademie für Musik und Darstellende Kunst and has composed orchestral, chamber and choral works, songs, sonatas for various instruments, and piano works. In Jordan there are also many groups using Western popular styles, rhythms and musical instruments to perform light and dance music.

Jordan (iii). English organ builders. Hawkins said that the elder Abraham Jordan (b ?Maidstone; d ?London, *c*1716) was a distiller who started making organs in about 1700. He taught his son, the younger Abraham Jordan (d ?London, 1755 or 1756), and they built an organ for the chapel of the Duke of Chandos and 'many organs for parish churches'. Their most famous instrument was that built in 1712 for St Magnus's, London Bridge, probably in collaboration with Christopher Shrider, which incorporated the first Swell box in an English organ (the case remains). It was advertised in The Spectator (8 Feb 1712) as 'a very large organ ... consisting of four sets of keys, one of which is adapted to the art of emitting sounds by swelling notes, which never was in any organ before'. Another organ by the Jordans, referred to in the London Journal (7 Feb 1730), had a reversed console so that 'the master when he plays sits with his face to the audience and, the keys being but three foot high, sees the whole company'. In 1726 the younger Jordan was organist of St Giles Cripplegate, London. After his death his foreman, John Sedgwick, succeeded to the business.

It may be inferred from Burney that partnerships between John Byfield (i), Richard Bridge and the younger Jordan were at least occasionally formed for the building of individual organs. Hawkins wrote that this was 'to prevent their underworking each other', and Hopkins and Rimbault attributed the arrangement to a fear of shoddy work by untrained builders, as a result of the demand for organs in the newly built churches of the early 18th century. Although no evidence survives of any formal connections, the younger Jordan's organs for St Luke's, Old Street, London (1733; case and some pipework survive at St Giles Cripplegate), and Exeter Cathedral (1742–4) were built in collaboration with Bridge, and that for Westminster Abbey (1730) has been ascribed to Christopher Shrider and Jordan together. Jordan, Byfield and Bridge are said to have worked together at St Nicholas, Great Yarmouth (1732) and St George's Chapel, Great Yarmouth (1733; case now at St John's, Smith Square). The Jordans' trade card depicts a case in the later style of 'Father' Smith, which resembles that built by the Jordans for St Saviour (now the cathedral), Southwark, in 1705. Their later cases are similar to those of Bridge, with one favourite model, an example of which survives at St Thomas's (now the cathedral), Portsmouth (1718). This has a large oval flat in the centre, and derives from Renatus Harris (e.g. Harris's organs at All Hallows, Lombard Street, London – now at All Hallows, Twickenham – and St Clement Eastcheap).

Other notable organs associated with the Jordans are St George's, Botolph Lane, London (1723; now at St George's, Southall; case and some pipework survive), St Benet Fink, London (1714; moved to Malmesbury Abbey and subsequently destroyed there; the console survives at the Department of Music, University of Reading), and St Helen's, Abingdon (1725; case survives). An organ built for Bath Abbey (1708) is now lost, except for some remarkable carved figures now in the church at Yatton, Somerset. The organ in Trinity Church, Boston, USA (1744; case survives) was built according to Jordan's detailed written instructions in an extant letter dated 3 July 1744; the same source mentions organs built for Lord Brook, Lord Gurnsey and the church at St Michael's Mount, Cornwall.

MICHAEL GILLINGHAM, GUY OLDHAM, NICHOLAS PLUMLEY

Jordan, Armin (b Lucerne, 9 April 1932). Swiss conductor. He studied in Lausanne and Geneva and began his career in 1957 as assistant conductor at the municipal theatre in Biel. He was principal conductor at the Zürich Opera (1963–8) and the municipal theatres in St Gallen (1968–71) and Basle (1971–89), and also of the Laussane Chamber Orchestra (1973–85) and the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande (1985–97) with which he made numerous recordings and tours. He has also been a regular guest at the Grand Théâtre, Genéva, the Paris Opéra and the Aix-en-Provence Festival. Jordan rarely conducted outside Switzerland and France until his US operatic début in 1985 at Seattle with Die Walküre which led to engagements at New York's Mostly Mozart Festival and the Metropolitan Opera. In 1997 he conducted Wagner's Parsifal at the Opéra Bastille, Paris. Both in the theatre and concert hall, Jordan's work is distinguished by his empathy with Mozart and also for late 19th-century German and French repertory. He has recorded music by Fauré, Dukas, Debussy and Ravel as well as Strauss and Wagner.

ANDREW CLARK

Jordan, Fred (b Ludlow, Shropshire, 1922). English traditional singer. The youngest of six children, he left school at 14 to become a farm hand. He went on to work with horses, in arable and stock farming, and then to do casual farm work. Although he became well-travelled, he retained the values, lifestyle and outward trappings of the pre-World War II rural worker.

Fred Jordan learnt songs from his father, his mother (who had performed in Birmingham music halls) and from Gypsy families in the locality. He performed his first song, The Gypsy's Warning, in public at the age of seven, and in 1952 was 'discovered' by Peter Kennedy, who recorded him for the BBC. He became a unique and popular club and festival performer within the Folk Song Revival. Sporting breeches, gaiters and flat cap, his repertory included traditional ballads as well as sentimental songs of more recent vintage.

REG HALL

Jordan, Jan. See DROZDOWSKI, JAN.

Jordan, Sverre (b Oslo, 25 May 1889; d Bergen, 10 Jan 1972). Norwegian composer, pianist and conductor. He studied with Klatte, Vianna da Motta, Gortakowski and Ansorge in Berlin (1907–14). After his début in Bergen in 1911 as composer and conductor, he appeared frequently in Norway, Denmark and Germany, conducting and playing the piano. He also played a major part in the musical life of Bergen as music critic of Morgenavisen (1917–31), conductor of the Harmonien choir (1922–32) and director of the Nationale Scenes orchestra (1931–57). He was the accompanist for Kirsten Flagstad and Marion Anderson, among others, on several tours.

Jordan's extensive output consists of orchestral works, concertos, chamber music, stage music, piano pieces and about 200 romances. He was not an experimental composer, rather a neo-Romantic who stylistically continued the tradition of Grieg. Among his best-known works are the melodrama Feberdigte ('Fever Poems'), Holbergs silhuetter for orchestra and the Violin Concerto. His lyrical sensitivity and capacity for irony and wit are particularly apparent in the romances, such as Mot tinderne op.11 no.1, Der synger ingen fugle op.33 no.3 and Tretton år op.54 no.1.

KARI MICHELSEN

Jordan, Thomas (b ?London, *c*1614; d London, bur. 17 April 1685). English poet, playwright and actor. He trained as a boy actor with the King's Revels Company and was later attached to the Red Bull Theatre. Shortly before the Restoration he began writing musical entertainments for the livery companies, and between 1671 and 1684 he wrote at least 12 Lord Mayor's triumphs. He delighted in poetry and music, describing them as the 'Twins of Fancy'. His circle included the musicians John Gamble, Theophilus Fitz (d 1708), Walter Yeokney (d 1665), John Playford and William Lawes, on whom he wrote the famous line 'Will Lawes was slain, by such whose Wills were laws' (The Musical Companion, RISM 1672[5]). He penned a commendatory poem to Gamble's 1659 book of Ayres and Dialogues, and prefaced the songs with 'A Defence for Musick in its Practique and Theorie'. He also copied the first catalogue and several of the lyrics in Gamble's commonplace-book. Jordan's own anthology of Cavalier poems with music (GB-NO) contains a mixture of political medleys, ballads, love poems and jigs set to anonymous popular tunes and to music by Gamble, Yeokney, John Wilson, Thomas Gibbes, Davis Mell and Mr (?John) Taylor.

LYNN HULSE

Jørgensen, Erik (b Copenhagen, 10 May 1912). Danish composer. A brother of the artist Mogens Jørgensen, he began studies in 1928 with Rung-Keller (organ), Jeppesen (theory), Rachlew (piano) and Høffding (composition). He passed the organ examinations at the Copenhagen Conservatory in 1931, and the pedagogical examinations in piano, theory and history in 1947 and 1948. He also studied conducting with Scherchen in Geneva (1936). From 1947 to 1982 he taught music theory and history at the Copenhagen Institute for the Blind.

From 1933 to 1943 his compositional style was influenced by Stravinsky, Bartók and Hindemith. An intensive study of Schoenberg's music led him to produce his only dogmatically atonal work, Modello per archi (1957), and he derived further stimulus from the 1960 ISCM Festival and the 1962 Darmstadt summer courses. In the early 1960s he used a free 12-note style (as in Figure in Tempo, 1960–61, rev. 1968), but his most frequently performed composition, the Quintet for two pianos, percussion and double bass (1962), is not dodecaphonic. He has written much for chamber ensemble, including Astrolabium (1964, discussed by him in Dansk Musiktidsskrift, xl, 1965, pp.68–9) and the Piece for String Quartet (1964–5), both of which employ a unique method, drawing on chance elements. The young people's opera Skyggen af en drøm (1969), in which quodlibets and collages blend materials from rock music, Gesualdo and Beethoven, won a competition sponsored by Det Unge Tonekunstner Selskab; it was followed by another children's opera, Eventyret (1973–5). Other works of this period include two orchestral pieces, Notturno (1965–6), in which graphic notation is employed, and Konfrontationer (1967–8). Recent works include vocal compositions, chamber music, a symphony (A Piece of Life, 1981) and a chamber concerto for piano and orchestra (1992–3).

Joris van Lankveld [Langhveldt]. See MACROPEDIUS, GEORGIUS.

Jörn, Karl (b Riga, 5 Jan 1873; d Denver, 19 Dec 1947). Latvian tenor, active in Germany and the USA. He studied with Jacobs Ress in Berlin and in 1896 made his début in Martha at Freiburg. Appearances at Zürich and Hamburg led to his engagement at the Berlin royal opera in 1902, where he remained until 1908. Covent Garden first heard him in a British double première, in 1906, of Poldini's one-act Vagabund und Prinzessin and Cornelius's Der Barbier von Bagdad. In the two following seasons he sang Walther in Die Meistersinger; his Loge in Das Rheingold was considered one of the best ever heard. He joined the Metropolitan in 1908, proving his adaptability in Mozart and Wagner, Massenet (Manon) and Mascagni (Cavalleria rusticana) and in a special performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony under Toscanini. He also sang Jeník in the American première of The Bartered Bride (1909). Taking American citizenship in 1916, he retired from singing to develop an invention for mineral-divining; then, losing his fortune, he returned in 1928, joining Johanna Gadski's touring company and singing (with great success) his first Tristan and Siegfried. He taught in New York and Denver, and gave a final performance as Lohengrin shortly before his death. His sturdy voice and lyric style can be heard in many recordings; they cover a wide repertory of song as well as opera, and include two of the earliest made of complete operas, Faust and Carmen, both recorded in 1908 with Emmy Destinn.

J.B. STEANE

José, Antonio [Martínez Palacios, Antonio José] (b Burgos, 12 Dec 1902; d Estépar, 8 Oct 1936). Spanish composer and conductor. He studied with the organists Julián García Blanco and José María Beobide Goiburu in Burgos. In 1920 the regional government of Burgos awarded him a scholarship to further his studies at the Madrid Conservatory for four years. He supplemented his income by conducting zarzuelas at the Teatro de la Latina and the Teatro Apolo, and by music copying. He worked as a music teacher at a Jesuit school in Miraflores de El Palo, Málaga (1925–9), and returned to Burgos in 1929 to conduct the revived choral society Orfeón Burgalés.

The final period of his life was dominated by his commitment to Burgos and its people. He was awarded the National Music Prize for his collections of folksongs from Burgos (1932) and was invited to present a paper on this subject at the Third Congress of the IMS (Barcelona, 1936). In the early days of the Civil War he was arrested by Falangists and imprisoned in Burgos. On 8 October 1936 he was driven to the nearby town of Estépar and shot, accused of being a Republican spy and Jewish sympathizer, and of inciting the people to revolt.

Antonio José's love of the folksong of his native region penetrated his entire output, from the series of Danzas burgalesas and the Sonata castellana for piano (which formed the basis for his Sinfonía castellana) to later choral and vocal works such as the Cinco coros castellanos and the Cuatro canciones populares burgalesas, and even his unfinished opera El mozo de mulas. Many of his works are based on literal quotations of popular melodies taken from Federico Olmeda's Cancionero de Burgos (1902) or on folksongs collected by the composer himself. Ravel is said to have referred to him as potentially the greatest Spanish composer of the 20th century.

Joseffy, Rafael (b Hunfalu, 3 July 1852; d New York, 25 June 1915). Hungarian pianist. His youth was spent in Miskolcz, where he began to study the piano at the age of eight. After further studies in Budapest he entered the Leipzig Conservatory (1866), where he was taught chiefly by E.F. Wenzel, though he also had a few lessons from Moscheles. From 1868 to 1870 he studied with Tausig in Berlin, and he spent the summers of 1870 and 1871 in Weimar taking lessons from Liszt. He first performed publicly in Berlin in 1870; soon he was giving concerts in most of the large European cities. In a review of 1874 Hanslick admired his brilliant technique but found his playing cold. Joseffy made his American début in New York in 1879, playing concertos by Chopin and Liszt in addition to solo items, and then settled in the USA. He toured with Theodore Thomas and his orchestra, and gave many recitals, being one of the first to perform Brahms's works regularly. From 1888 to 1906 he taught the piano at the National Conservatory, New York. In his youth he composed some salon pieces, a set of lieder and numerous arrangements of works by Bach, Haydn, Chopin and others; but he was much better known for his editions of Chopin's works (15 volumes) and of studies by Czerny, Henselt, Schlözer and Moscheles; he also wrote a valuable of School of Advanced Piano Playing (New York, 1902).

Joseph I, Holy Roman Emperor (b Vienna, 26 July 1678; d Vienna, 17 April 1711). Habsburg ruler and amateur musician. As the eldest son of Leopold I by his third wife Eleanora Magdalena Theresia of Pfalz-Neuburg he became hereditary King of Hungary in Bratislava in 1687 and was crowned King of Rome in Augsburg three years later; he succeeded his father as Holy Roman Emperor on 5 May 1705. In his youth he received music lessons from J.J. Prinner and played the harpsichord, flute and other instruments. He had a talent for music and dancing and between 1682 and 1699 he took part in many performances at the court theatre in Vienna as a singer, dancer and flautist. His surviving compositions are plainly influenced by the style of Alessandro Scarlatti, yet on the whole they have more individuality than the works of Leopold I; the aria Tutto in pianto, for example, has one of the earliest obbligato parts for chalumeau.

OTHMAR WESSELY/STEVEN SAUNDERS

Joseph, Jane M(arian) (b London, 31 May 1894; d London, 9 March 1929). English composer. A pupil of Holst at St Paul's Girls' School, she graduated in classics from Cambridge (1916) but thereafter pursued a musical career in close association with Holst. One of his amanuenses (for example in Neptune), she prepared vocal scores (as in The Hymn of Jesus, for which she also advised on the translation) and deputized for his teaching. As well as participating in his Morley College activities as a singer and instrumentalist (on the double bass, horn and timpani), she organized presentations such as Purcell's Dioclesian (1921). Joseph helped produce Holst's choral ballets, writing the libretto for The Golden Goose (1926). She taught at Eothen School, Caterham, and helped found the Kensington Musical Competition Festivals (1922) and Kensington Choral Society (1925). A member of the Society of Women Musicians from 1919, she joined its Composers' Sectional Committee in 1921. Holst's influence is easily detected in her music, for instance in the modality and whole tones in Mirage, re-creation of folk melody in Morris Dance, orchestral flair in Bergamask and striding bass in A Festival Venite. He rated her 'the best girl pupil I ever had' in composition, but her many amateur involvements and early death from kidney failure prevented the full realization of her creative gifts.

ALAN GIBBS

Joseph Hūzāyā (fl Nisbis, *c*530). According to tradition, the inventor of Syriac EKPHONETIC NOTATION.

Josephs, Wilfred (b Newcastle upon Tyne, 24 July 1927; d London, 17 Nov 1997). English composer. At the age of 16 he had his first lessons in harmony and counterpoint, from Arthur Milner. He took a degree in dental surgery at Newcastle upon Tyne in 1951, and practised dentistry during two years' army service. In 1954 he won a scholarship to the GSM, where he worked for two years under Alfred Nieman; this was followed by a year in Paris, studying with Max Deutsch (1958–9). He had already won several prizes in international competitions when, in 1963, his Requiem was awarded first prize in the first International Competition of La Scala and the City of Milan, after which he was able to abandon dentistry for full-time composition.

The Requiem, written in memory of the Jewish dead of World War II, is bold and unconventional in conception and form. It is a setting of the Hebrew Kaddish – the prayer for the dead – consisting of ten movements, nine of them slow. The first, fifth ('Lacrimosa') and ninth are for string quintet alone – reworkings of an earlier quintet. The music ranges in mood from the contemplative, as in the tranquil, harp-coloured orchestral seventh movement ('De profundis'), to the defiant, as in the Waltonesque explosive orchestration of the third movement and pungent dissonances of the sixth. The vocal writing is imbued with a lyrical intensity. It was Josephs' masterful full-scale opera Rebecca, however, which received international acclaim, enjoying several revivals since its successful première in 1983. The arresting score sustains suspense in an almost cinematic manner. There is a Bergian richness to the orchestral interludes, while the vocal set pieces contain great individuality and lyrical beauty, particularly the Girl's aria in Act 1, accompanied by flute, harp and strings, and Max's Act 3 aria supported by the remarkable 'Manderley' 18-part chord. Such dramatic flair lent itself easily to the medium of television and film: of his 200 or so scores, many, including Swallows and Amazons, The Great War and I, Claudius, have enjoyed popular success. In 1988 he was appointed music consultant to the London International Film School.

Besides a remarkable stylistic versatility, Josephs' works share characteristic features: a form of Schoenbergian continuous development, clarity, orchestral brilliance and a fine sense of dramatic timing and effect. Works such as the Battle of Britain Suite, Aelian Dances and other occasional pieces demonstrate his orchestration skills, while his choice of unusual combinations of solo instruments in concertos reinforces his concern for colour. Alongside English influences of Walton and Vaughan Williams, a more cosmopolitan identity emerges in many of his more searching works. For example, the dark Expressionism of Shostakovich in the Seventh Symphony, the rhythmic energy of Bartók and Stravinsky in the Second Piano Concerto and the novel soundscapes of the third and fourth string quartets. Josephs was also master of more accessible idioms, as in the appealing Viola Concerto (1983), which combines virtuoso toccata passage-work with melting, jazz-influenced melodies; and the 1995 Pictures from an Imaginary Exhibition for piano with its postmodernist references to Chopin, the blues, brass bands and Musorgsky. In 1995 the Wilfred Josephs Society was founded to promote performance and appreciation of the composer's music.

HUGO COLE/MALCOLM MILLER

Josephson, Jacob Axel (b Stockholm, 27 March 1818; d Uppsala, 29 March 1880). Swedish composer and conductor. He belonged to a Jewish family which came to Sweden at the end of the 18th century and still plays an important role in Swedish cultural life. In 1841, when he was studying at the University of Uppsala, he was baptized (adding Axel to his name). In the same year he published his first solo songs, dedicated to Jenny Lind. He taught music at the Cathedral School (1841–3) and led a singing society, Lilla Sällskapet, which devoted itself mainly to ancient sacred music (Gunnar Wennerberg was a member). Josephson completed his university studies in 1842 with a small thesis on modern music, Några momenter till en karakteristik af den nyaste musiken, in which he attacked Rossini and praised Mendelssohn. With financial assistance from Jenny Lind he studied music abroad from 1844 to 1847. He stayed in Rome during winter 1845–6, but spent most of the time in Leipzig, where he studied composition with Moritz Hauptmann and Niels Gade; he also took organ lessons with Schneider in Dresden.

On his return to Sweden in 1847 Josephson became conductor of the Harmonic Society in Stockholm. In 1849 he was appointed director musices (leader of the university orchestra) in Uppsala and in the same year he founded the Philharmonic Society. In 1854 he also became the leader of the Orphei Drängar which he made into an élite men's chorus. He was elected a member of the Swedish Royal Academy of Music in 1857. In 1864 he instigated regular university lectures on the history of music and in the same year he was appointed organist at Uppsala Cathedral; he founded the cathedral choir, one of the first of its kind in Sweden, in 1867. In that year he also visited Germany to study German church music, especially congregational singing. After Berwald's death in 1868 work on the revision of the Swedish hymnal was taken on by Josephson; his proposal was printed in 1877, but never officially adopted.

As a conductor of his various ensembles, Josephson made Uppsala for many years one of the principal musical centres of the country. In his own music he never abandoned the models of his youth, Mendelssohn and A.F. Lindblad. His most successful works were his solo songs with piano accompaniment, such as Stjärnklart and Sjung, sjung, du underbara sång. Some of these were even sung abroad by Jenny Lind. Among his songs for men's chorus Serenad, Vårsång and Requiem are still sung. Josephson also wrote a symphony and several choral works with orchestral accompaniment, among them Islossningen and Quando corpus. He published two collections of sacred songs: Zion (monthly from 1867 to 1870) and Sånger i Zion (1880).

FOLKE BOHLIN

Joshi, Bhimsen (b Karnataka, 14 Feb 1922). North Indian (Hindustani) classical music vocalist. His attraction to vocal music from a very early age led his father to find local instructors for him. However, Joshi was inspired by recordings of the khayāl singers Abdul Karim Khan and his disciple Sawai Gandharva of the Kirana gharānā, and ran away from home at the age of 11 in search of a guru. Singing for sustenance, he travelled to Gwalior where he garnered the support of Hafiz Ali Khan for study at the Madhav Sangeet Vidyalaya. Leaving there after six months in search of individual rather than group tutelage, Joshi wandered from place to place and from teacher to teacher for two years until the Gwalior master Vinayakrao Patwardhan advised him to return home to study in Kundgol with Sawai Gandharva. After five years of traditional guru-śiṣya-paramparā with Gandharva (1935–40), a concert in Pune on the occasion of his guru's 60th birthday launched Joshi on a career as a Kirana singer of khayāl.

Joshi took some instruction beyond Kirana with Mushtaq Hussein Khan of the Sahaswan/Rampur gharānā and also borrowed stylistic traits from Agra and Gwalior gharānā singers. His vocal style reveals that eclecticism. He has particularly cultivated Kirana subtlety in intonation, and his use of ornamentation is highly controlled for dramatic effect. He exploits dynamic contrast, singing loudly in the high register and almost soundlessly thereafter, and varies tāns by means of a series of sudden, rhythmic vocal thrusts followed by a volley of rapid pitches. Almost uniquely, he sings to the vowel 'i' in the high register, and unlike most Hindustani singers he uses physical movement to punctuate his improvisation. He has effective breath control, singing long melodic phrases in one breath.

Joshi's structuring of khayāl is also distinctive. Unlike other Kirana singers, he enjoys playing with rhythm, including cadential tihāīs; he seldom uses the sargam syllables as text, and he does not dwell on slow improvisation. He gives generous performance time to the antarā, the second section of the khayāl composition, and he dramatically exploits vocal silence after cadences. In addition to khayāl and ṭhumrī, Joshi performs popular Marathi songs (pad) and has given concerts of devotional songs in Marathi and Kannada languages set to classical tunes.

Joshi gradually narrowed the number of rāgas he performs, emphasizing Darbārī, Ābhogi and Mālkauns, and he has created rāgas Kalaśrī, Lalit-Bhaṭiyār and Mārvā-Śrī. His recordings, numerous by the standards of Hindustani classical vocal music, display a broader range of repertory; in honour of his rare contribution, HMV awarded him a platinum disc.

Joshi began foreign tours in 1964, first to Afghanistan and then to America, Canada, Europe and the Middle East. He has won India's most prestigious awards: the Padma Shri, which he received from the President of India in 1972, the Sangeet Natak Akademi Award for Hindustani vocal music (1975), the Padma Bhushan (1985), the Tansen Samman from the government of Madhya Pradesh (1992) and the Padma Vibhushan (1999).

BONNIE C. WADE

Josif, Enriko (b Belgrade, 1 May 1924). Serbian composer. He graduated from Milenko Živković's composition class at the Belgrade Academy of Music (1954) and completed his studies in Rome (1961–2). He was professor of composition at the Belgrade Academy (1957–89) and was elected corresponding member of the Serbian Academy of Sciences and Arts in 1991.

His compositions draw upon Baroque and medieval sounds and forms, placed in correlation with a modern musical idiom. This sense of balance is reflected also in the contrast of dense and transparent sonorities, and homophonic and polyphonic textures, as in the Lirska simfonija ('The Lyric Symphony') and the Piano Concerto. The original version of Smrt Stevana Dečanskog ('The Death of Stevan Dečanski', 1956) evokes the age of organum, the motet and gymel, while its stage version aims at total theatre. Other representative works are the Sonata antica, with its Preludio–Ricercar, Sarabanda–Fughetta–Giga and Aria–Passacaglia, and Tri psalma ('Three Psalms'), a piano piece noticeable for its psalmodic recitative and organum-like rhythms. Many of his works are richly orchestrated and contain acrid harmony; they are marked by formal unconventionality and dramatic tension.

ROKSANDA PEJOVIĆ

Josquin, Jan [Josquinus, Johannes] (fl 1561–3). Czech theorist. He matriculated at Wittenberg University on 30 April 1563 under the name of 'Johannes Josquinus Boleslavensis'. At first thought to be a Frenchman or Netherlander fleeing religious persecution, Jan Josquin is now regarded as a Czech, his name a pseudonym in homage to Josquin des Prez. Hostinský's theory that he was identical to Jan Blahoslav's associate Václav Solín (b 1526/7; d Třebič, 5 June 1566) was refuted by Dolanský. Vávra identified him with Jan Facilis (b Byčkov; d after 1570), a schoolteacher and member of a literary society in Prostějov, and the composer of a four-part Ovidian ode. Sovík (1987) has exposed the weaknesses in Dlanský's and Vávra's reasoning and vindicated Hostinský. The strongest evidence for identifying Josquin with Solín is a mutilated annotation on the title-page of the only surviving copy of his treatise, which appears to state 'B[rother] V. Solín wrote this ...'. But Slovík's other arguments, though forcibly stated, are inconclusive, and it is not impossible that the true identity behind the pseudonym has yet to be uncovered.

Jan Josquin's Muzyka: to gest zpráwa k zpjwanij naležitá ('Music: that is, a report on what belongs to singing'; Prostějov, 1561; ed. in Hostinský; Eng. trans., 1991) appeared shortly after the first Czech work of music theory, Jan Blahoslav's Musica: to gest knjžka zpěwákům náležité zprávy w sobě zawjragjcý ('Music: that is, a book containing necessary information for singers'; Olomouc, 1558, enlarged 2/1569; ed. in Hostinský; Eng. trans., 1991). The only surviving copy of Josquin's treatise (in CZ-Pnm) is incomplete, breaking off towards the end of chapter 8 and lacking the last two chapters. A supposed earlier edition in 1551 or 1559 cannot have existed, as examples are explicitly drawn from the 'new' Cantional of the Bohemian Brethren published in 1561.

Like Blahoslav's book, Josquin's Muzyka is an elementary textbook for those without a knowledge of Latin, covering the rudiments of music and mensural notation but not counterpoint or composition; it goes into rather more detail than Blahoslav had done. The contents replicate those of many elementary treatises from Central Europe in the early and mid-16th century, but the now lost chapter 9, 'O regimentu', seems to have been more unusual. Josquin defined regiment as 'how each voice is based, in which place, and how to take one voice from another when you wish to sing in three or four parts'; the word, extremely rare as applied to music theory, recalls an important and otherwise unique section on the 'direction' (regimen) of plainchant and polyphonic choirs in the Czech theorist Venceslaus Philomathes's Musicorum libri quatuor (Vienna, 1512), which is one of the earliest witnesses to the practice of conducting.

JEFFREY DEAN, JOHN TYRRELL

Josquin (Lebloitte dit) des Prez [Josse, Gosse, Joskin, Jossequin, Josquinus, Jodocus, Judocus, Juschino; Desprez, des Près, des Prés, de Prés, a Prato, de Prato, Pratensis] (b ? nr Saint Quentin, *c*1450–55; d Condé-sur-l'Escaut, 27 Aug 1521). French composer. He was one of the greatest composers of the Renaissance, whose reputation stands on a level with those of Du Fay, Ockeghem, Palestrina, Lassus and Byrd. His music spans the transition between the sound-world of the late Middle Ages and that of the High Renaissance, and served as a model for much of the 16th century. 'Josquin' is the diminutive of Josse (Lat. Judocus), the name of a Breton saint active in northern France and Flanders in the 7th century; an uncommon name in recent times, it was widespread in that region during the 15th and 16th centuries.

1. BIRTH, FAMILY AND EARLY TRAINING (*c*1450–75). The documentation of Josquin's life is riddled with gaps; the earlier part of his career has been subject to considerable re-evaluation since the middle of the 20th century, and his place and date of birth remain uncertain. The evidence for the early part of his life is largely derivative or inferential, although a few definite points can be established.

Josquin spent the last years of his life as provost of the collegiate church of Notre Dame in Condé-sur-l'Escaut, on the border of the imperial county of Hainaut, and it is evident that he had long-standing family connections with the place (fig.1). Documents connected with his inheritance of property in the town in 1483 show that his apparently childless uncle and aunt, Gilles Lebloitte dit Desprez and Jacque Banestonne, had named him their heir already in 1466, perhaps after the death of his father Gossard Lebloitte dit Desprez; the will had been witnessed by the mayor and several aldermen of Condé (see Matthews and Merkley, 1998). Josquin himself is given the same complex surname in these documents, and it is evident that the family name was actually Lebloitte, while Des Prez was a sobriquet (perhaps assumed by Josquin's grandfather since both his father and his uncle used it) that was evolving into a surname.

Josquin cannot, however, have been born in Condé, for just before his death he declared himself legally a foreigner (aubain); he must therefore have been born outside the lordship of Condé if not outside the Empire. Josquin stated that he was from beyond the 'Noir Eauwe', perhaps referring to the Eau Noire in the Ardennes, which formed part of the southern boundary between Hainaut and France. A village called Prez, possibly perhaps the origin of the family sobriquet, is located about 17 km south of this river (see Clarke, 1966), but Josquin may have meant some as yet unidentified watercourse nearer to Condé (see Kellman, 1971).

1. Map of northern France and the Low Countries, c1500

The former hypothesis receives some support from the tantalizingly imprecise evidence of the 17th-century antiquary Claude Hémeré (Tabella chronologica decanorum ... ecclesiae S. Quintini, Paris, 1633, pp.161–2 = 159–60). He stated that Josquin had been first a choirboy at the royal collegiate church of Saint Quentin, then in charge of its music, but he gave no specific dates. Hémeré's inaccurate statement that Josquin was master of the French royal chapel under François I (see below) does not necessarily cast doubt on his reporting of the documents from St Quentin, which he consulted, though they were destroyed in 1669. Saint Quentin was an important centre of French royal musical patronage: Loyset Compère (d 1518) and Jean Mouton (d 1522), for example, held canonries there, and both composers were buried in the church. Saint Quentin, though it lies some 70 or 80 km to the west, was the natural centre of gravity for the district south of the Eau Noire.

Josquin's deathbed declaration shows that the famous statement by the poet Ronsard that Josquin was 'Hennuyer de nation' (preface to Livre de meslanges, Paris, 1560, 2/1572[2]) involves a confusion of his later residence in Hainaut with his birthplace. In the Tschudi Liederbuch (Ch-SGs 463), copied around 1540 by a friend of Glarean's, Josquin is called 'belga Veromanduus' (from the county of Vermandois, whose chief town was Saint Quentin). Finally, Josquin may himself have given a clue to his birthplace in his motet Illibata Dei virgo nutrix: the initial letters (in one case a word) of the verses of the prima pars spell out his name IOSQVIN Des PREZ, and a corresponding acrostic has been suspected in the secunda pars. Here the division into verses is less clear; the most plausible candidate seems to be ACAVVESCAVGA, out of which the name of the river Escau(t) leaps to the eye. The Escaut rises about 20 km north of Saint Quentin, and it has been speculated that Josquin was born in the nearby village of Beaurevoir (Raugel, 1921).

The date of Josquin's birth was long estimated at about 1450, until in 1956 Claudio Sartori brought to light many documents concerning one Judochus de Picardia or Juschinus de Frantia, who was an adult singer (biscantor) of Milan Cathedral from 1459 to 1472; he identified this man with a singer of the same name in the chapel of Duke Galeazzo Maria Sforza from 1473 (earlier documented by Porro, 1878–9, and Motta, 1887), long identified with Josquin des Prez. A date of birth around 1450 remained plausible so long as Josquin's earliest known activity was in 1473, but the extension of his adult career back as far as 1459 compelled a new estimate of about 1440. Recent archival discoveries have enlarged our knowledge about the Milanese singer, however, and finally proved him distinct from Josquin des Prez. The surname of the Josquin in Milan was latinized as 'de Kessalia'; his father's name was Honodius rather than Gossard; and he continued to serve the Milanese court until his death in 1498 (see Matthews and Merkley, 1998). There no longer seems any reason to doubt that Josquin des Prez was born about 1450 or perhaps a few years later, that he was a close contemporary of Compère and Isaac and only a few years older than Obrecht; his earliest known activity in the mid-1470s fits reasonably with such a date.

If Josquin was not a choirboy at Saint Quentin as Hémeré stated, he must have been trained in a similar maîtrise elsewhere in northern France or Hainaut, perhaps in Condé itself. Nothing whatever is known of his movements before he appears in the service of René of Anjou in the late 1470s (see below), but there are one or two suggestive clues. Josquin seems to have had some significant contact with Ockeghem, although the statement of Zarlino (Le istitutioni harmoniche, 1558, repeated by Zacconi, Prattica di musica, 1592) that he was a pupil of Ockeghem's is unsupported and may only mean that he learnt from the older composer's example. Nevertheless, no fewer than four apparently early works make use of Ockeghem's chanson D'ung aultre amer (a mass, a separate Sanctus and the motets Tu solus qui facis mirabilia and Victimae paschali laudes), and the early double motet Alma Redemptoris mater/Ave regina caelorum begins by quoting the opening of Ockeghem's Alma Redemptoris mater. Most suggestively, Josquin set Jean Molinet's lament on Ockeghem's death (1497), Nymphes des bois, as one of his most celebrated and moving works; he was also named in the company of musicians associated with the French royal chapel (of which Ockeghem had been a high-ranking member since the early 1450s) in Guillaume Crétin's long poem on Ockeghem's death.

Josquin had earlier been listed in Compère's motet Omnium bonorum plena, which names a number of musicians associated in some degree with Cambrai Cathedral, including Tinctoris and Regis but pre-eminently Guillaume Du Fay; the occasion may have been the cathedral's dedication in 1472 (see G. Montagna, EMH, vii, 1987), but it must in any case have antedated Du Fay's death in 1474. The names of Busnoys and Ockeghem are followed by 'Des pres', which most likely refers to Josquin, who was a cleric of the diocese of Cambrai. It is less probable that Pasquier du Pré (also called Desprez), a member of the Burgundian court chapel from 1464 to 1477 who had no known connection to Cambrai, was meant (but see Hamm, 1960). As with his relationship to Ockeghem, it is unclear what the nature of Josquin's association with Cambrai Cathedral may have been.

2. Aix-en-Provence, ?Paris, Condé-sur-l'Escaut (c1475–1483). The first certain employment of Josquin is attested by a document dated 19 April 1477 which calls him 'Josquinus Despres' and lists him as a singer in the chapel in Aix-en-Provence of René, duke of Anjou, Lorraine and Bar, count of Provence and nominal king of Naples, Sicily and Jerusalem. Another document seems to place him in Aix already in 1475 (see Merkeley, 1999, p.428). His presence at René's court in Aix lasted at least until 26 March 1478, when a document in French refers to him as 'Jossequin des Prez' and certifies his eligibility to receive the first available prebend in the collegiate church of St Maxe du Château in Bar-le-Duc, the capital of René's duchy of Bar. There is no further documentation for Josquin until early 1483, but he may well have remained in the service of René until the latter's death in 1480. If he did, then in all probability he transferred in 1481 along with the other singers in René's chapel to the service of King Louis XI of France, who placed René's singers in the Ste Chapelle, Paris. Josquin's motet Misericordias Domini in aeternum cantabo suggests direct contact with Louis: in 1481 the seriously ill king ordered the artist Jean Bourdichon to paint this verse from Psalm lxxxviii in azure lettering on 50 scrolls displayed throughout his château of Plessis-lés-Tours (see Macey, 1991). Josquin seems to have created a musical testament for Louis, who died in August 1483 with the psalm verse 'In te Domine speravi, non confundar in aeternum' – the closing words of the motet – on his lips.

After a documentary hiatus of nearly five years, Josquin's name reappears in February and March 1483, when he returned to Condé-sur-l'Escaut to claim his inheritance from his uncle and aunt, mentioned above. About the same time, he was given four los of wine by the chapter of Notre Dame, Condé, to mark 'his first return after the French wars' (see Reese and Noble, 1984). The wars between France and Burgundy had lasted from the death of Duke Charles the Bold of Burgundy in 1477 until 1483. Condé, just over the border in imperial territory, had been besieged and captured in May 1478 by King Louis XI, but just one month later, under threat of an approaching army led by the Habsburg Archduke Maximilian, the king's forces abandoned Condé after locking the populace into the church and setting fire to the town. Possibly Josquin's uncle and aunt perished in the conflagration; he seems to have taken the first opportunity upon the establishment of peace to return and settle their estate.

The level of Josquin's attainment as a composer by the early 1480s is demonstrated not only by Misericordias Domini but by a number of works that had been copied by that time. The Casanatense chansonnier (I-Rc 2856) was prepared in Ferrara most probably about 1480 to honour the betrothal of Isabella d'Este to Francesco Gonzaga (see LockwoodMRF). In addition to works by composers active in Ferrara and Milan, such as Johannes Martini, Agricola, Compère and Japart, the manuscript contains French and Burgundian music, including works by Ockeghem, Hayne van Ghizeghem and Busnoys, none of whom travelled to Italy. It ascribes six chansons to Josquin (spelling his name differently each time, which suggests it was not well known to the copyist): Adieu mes amours, the four-voice En l'ombre d'ung buissonet, Et trop penser, Ile fantazies de Joskin, Que vous ma dame and Une mousque de Biscaye. The polished and expressive Ave Maria ... virgo serena was copied within a few years of 1476 into some blank pages at the end of a gathering in the Leopold codex (D-Mbs Mus.ms.3154) whose paper is dated in that year.

3. Milan and elsewhere (1484–9). While the Josquin in Milan from 1459 is now known to have been a different man, Josquin des Prez was indeed associated with the Milanese court in the 1480s; he may have entered Sforza service soon after his 1483 visit to Condé. On 19 June 1484 Josquin supplicated for the rectorship of the church of Saint Aubin in the diocese of Bourges, some 12 km south of Issoudun, asking for dispensation to hold the benefice without being ordained a priest (see Matthews, 1998). He is named in the supplication as a chaplain and member of the household of Cardinal Ascanio Sforza, who had been elevated to the cardinalate in March 1484 and was residing for the time in Milan. Although the supplication wrongly gives his name as 'Jacobus Despres', it is plain from subsequent documents dealing with the same benefice that it is Josquin who was meant. In a document dated 19 August 1484 'Joschinus de Prattis' appointed procurators to take possession of the rectorship of Saint Aubin (see Matthews and Merkley, 1998); these included Hector Charlemagne, a former singer in the chapel of René of Anjou, and François Guiberteau, secretary of the chancery of Paris (an association that lends support to the hypothesis of Josquin's employment at the Ste Chapelle in the early 1480s).

Josquin must have accompanied Cardinal Ascanio to Rome in August 1484 because a document in the Vatican archives dated July 1485 states that he planned to leave the cardinal's service and depart to attend to his affairs. He may have travelled to Paris: another Vatican document dated February 1489 indicates that Josquin and others had been involved in litigation before the Parlement of Paris with regard to the benefice in Saint Aubain (see Sherr, forthcoming). By this time – and probably earlier – Josquin had returned to Milan, where in January and February 1489 he witnessed documents resigning the rectorship of Saint Aubin. The last of these refers to him as 'cantorem duchalem', indicating that he was nominally in the service of the young Duke Gian Galeazzo Sforza; in fact Gian Galeazzo's uncle Ludovico il Moro (Ascanio's elder brother) controlled the government of Milan and must have been Josquin's actual patron. Franchinus Gaffurius, who had been appointed choirmaster of Milan Cathedral in January 1484, seems to have been acquainted with Josquin during this period: in his Angelicum ac divinum opus musice (1508), he referred to discussions with Josquin and Gaspar van Weerbeke 'many years previously'.

It must also have been during these years that Serafino dall'Aquila, who was in the service of Ascanio Sforza between 1484 and 1491, wrote his sonnet 'Ad Jusquino suo compagno musico d'Ascanio' (To Josquin, his fellow musician of Ascanio): in it he urged the composer not to be discouraged if his 'genius so sublime' seemed poorly remunerated. Zarlino positively identified 'Jusquino' with Josquin des Prez when he reprinted the sonnet in his Sopplimenti musicali of 1588. While it seems more probable that Josquin spent the early 1480s in French royal service, as described above, it has also been proposed that he may have joined Ascanio's household as early as 1480. According to this hypothesis, he would have spent the years from 1480 to 1482 with Ascanio, who was banished from Milan for plotting against his brother Ludovico, fleeing first to Ferrara and then to Naples (see Lowinsky, 1971). If Josquin was indeed with Ascanio in Ferrara, this might account for the composition of the Missa 'Hercules dux Ferrariae' in honour of Duke Ercole d'Este, a mass that has been judged too early in style for Josquin's period of formal service to Ercole in 1503–4 (see LockwoodMRF; Elders, 1998). Other evidence points to a renewed or continued association between Josquin and Ascanio Sforza in the late 1490s (see below).

A further speculation places Josquin in Hungary in the mid-1480s. In a late account from 1539, the papal nuncio in Vienna described the court of King Matthias Corvinus: 'it had excellent painters and musicians, among them even Josquin himself' (Király, 1992). Italian singers and instrumentalists had been imported to the brilliant court in Budapest in the 1480s, and a papal envoy reported in 1483 that its chapel was as accomplished as any he knew. No primary documents, however, attest to Josquin's membership in the Hungarian chapel, and the nuncio may merely have been retailing an unsubstantiated rumour.

Although it is no longer necessary or appropriate to account for Josquin's works of the 1470s in terms of Milanese styles and practices, these do seem to be reflected in some works, which should therefore be dated in the 1480s. The motet-cycle Vultum tuum deprecabuntur, in particular, seems to be a set of motetti missales (see Osthoff, 1962–5; Macey, 1996) – motets that substitute for individual sections of the Mass. This genre was especially cultivated at the court of Galeazzo Maria Sforza in the 1470s by Weerbeke and Compère, but it evidently continued in the 1480s; Gaffurius composed one such cycle and a number of hybrid masses, and his choirbooks preserve Weerbeke's and Compère's cycles along with several motets from Josquin's Vultum tuum.

4. The papal chapel (1489–c1495). Josquin joined the papal chapel in June 1489, not long after his last appearance in Milanese documents. He may have gone to Rome as part of an exchange of singers between Ludovico Sforza and Pope Innocent VIII involving Gaspar van Weerbeke, who had served the Sforza court from 1472 until 1480 and then moved to the papal chapel in 1481, remaining there until mid-April 1489, when he returned to Milan. Josquin served as a papal singer at least until early 1495 (see Noble, 1971), at first under Innocent VIII, from 1492 under the Borgia Pope Alexander VI. It was believed until recently that he had joined the papal chapel a few years earlier in September 1486, and then was curiously absent from February 1487 until June 1489 (with a one-month appearance in September 1487), but the 'Jo. de Pratis' named in the paylists in 1486 and 1487 has now been securely identified as Johannes Stokem (see Starr, 1997). How long Josquin remained in the chapel is unknown, since the accounts from 1495 to 1500 are lost; when they resume, Josquin is no longer listed. Recent restorations to the cantoria of the Cappella Sistina have revealed his name, 'Josquinj', carved into the wall (see Pietschmann, 1999), though it is hard to be sure whether he did this himself.

Like his colleagues, Josquin took advantage of his tenure at the papal chapel to pursue benefices. He laid claim to a canonry at Notre Dame, Saint Omer, and a parish in the gift of the Benedictine monastery at Saint Ghislain (1489), to the parish church of Basse-Yttre and two parishes near Frasnes in Hainaut (1493), as well as to a canonry at St Géry, Cambrai (1494) (see Noble, 1971; Sherr, 1994). Although there is no evidence that Josquin ever obtained possession of these benefices, they do reveal a pattern of intent, since all fell within Burgundian–Imperial territory and all were within his home diocese of Cambrai except for Saint Omer, in the diocese of Thérouanne. Applications by Josquin for benefices in Burgundian lands can be explained by the fact that although he was apparently born in French territory, perhaps Picardy, this region had been under Burgundian control almost continuously from 1435 to 1477. Josquin, as a cleric of the diocese of Cambrai, apparently demonstrated his allegiance by seeking benefices in Burgundian rather than French lands; in this context his previously mentioned negotiations over a benefice in the French diocese of Bourges in the late 1480s may be viewed as an anomaly.

For the papal chapel Josquin composed the tract for Ash Wednesday, Domine, non secundum, also set in polyphony by other papal composers including Marbriano de Orto and Bertrand Vaqueras (see Sherr, 1988); all three settings are found in the earliest choirbook copied in the papal chapel (I-Rvat C.S.35). He also composed stanzas from the hymns Ave maris stella and Nardi Maria pistici as part of the papal chapel's enlargement of Du Fay's hymn cycle. Josquin's five-voice tenor motet Illibata Dei virgo nutrix may also date from the same period, since it is found in another late 15th-century Vatican choirbook (Rvat C.S.15), and other composers in Rome, notably Weerbeke, cultivated the tenor motet around this time (see Sherr, 1988).

5. Italy and France (1498–1503). It appears that by December 1498 Josquin may have left the papal chapel and re-entered the service of Ascanio Sforza: in that month Ludovico Gonzaga, bishop of Mantua, wrote to Rome that he was sending a servant named 'Juschino' to deliver some hunting dogs to Ascanio. In February 1499 Ascanio wrote to Isabella d'Este, thanking her for the gift of hunting dogs that had been delivered by his servant Juschino. It was probably about this time that Josquin composed the two frottole In te Domine speravi and El grillo, published by Petrucci with the ascription 'Josquin Dascanio' (RISM 1504[4] and 1505[4]); frottole with their characteristics can have originated no earlier than the 1490s (see Prizer, 1989), so the works cannot belong to Josquin's earlier period of service with Ascanio in the mid-1480s. Not long afterwards, in a letter of December 1499, Johannes Vivaysius, a singer of the Duke of Ferrara, sent an unspecified composition by Josquin to Francesco Gonzaga in Mantua (see Gallico, 1971). Although there is no implication that Josquin was present, the letter indicates the availability of his music in Ferrara and Mantua in the late 1490s.

The 1490s were particularly turbulent years for Italy, beginning in November 1494 when King Charles VIII of France led his army down the peninsula, halting briefly at Florence and Rome before moving on to occupy Naples in early 1495. The invasion triggered decades of political turmoil in Italy, including the expulsion of the Medici from Florence in 1494 and the dominance of the city's political life by the extremist reforming friar Girolamo Savonarola until 1498, when he was burnt at the stake as a heretic. In 1499 another French invasion by the new French king, Louis XII, toppled the Sforza dynasty in Milan. Louis eventually captured and imprisoned both Ludovico and Ascanio Sforza in 1500, and added 'Duke of Milan' to his other titles.

Circumstantial evidence indicates that Josquin returned north to service with the king of France at this time. Glarean (Dodecachordon, 1547) related an anecdote that places Josquin at the court of Louis XII (reigned 1498–1515; in repeating the tale Hémeré mistakenly substituted the name of Louis' successor François I). The composer, so the story goes, had been promised a benefice by the king, who had failed to keep his word. As a pointed reminder, Josquin composed a motet on verses from Psalm cxviii, Memor esto verbi tui servo tuo ('Remember your word to your servant'). The work is said to have produced the desired effect, for members of the court applauded it and the king was shamed into fulfilling his promise. Glarean went on to say that Josquin offered his thanks by setting the subsequent verses of the same psalm, Bonitatem fecisti cum servo tuo Domine, but while Memor esto undoubtedly ranks as a work of Josquin's full maturity, Bonitatem fecisti is by another composer altogether, Carpentras (Elzéar Genet). Glarean's story may hold some truth, despite his erroneous attribution of the latter motet.

Other works by Josquin that seem to have been destined for the French royal court are the fanfare-like Vive le roy and In exitu Israel, a setting of Psalm cxiii that paraphrases the tonus peregrinus and concludes with the antiphon for Sunday Vespers; in this it resembles settings of this psalm by Jean Mouton and Claudin de Sermisy, members of the French royal chapel (see Macey, 1991). Likewise, the five-voice setting of the funeral Psalm cxxix, De profundis, with its triple canon signalled by the words 'Les trois estas sont assemblés/Pour le soulas des trespassés' ('The three estates have gathered to pray for the dead'), may have been composed for the funeral of Louis XII in 1515 (see Osthoff, 1962–5), or perhaps for a different royal funeral, such as that of Philip the Fair (d 1506) or Louis XII's queen, Anne of Brittany (d 1514; see Kellman, 1971).

Helmuth Osthoff (1962–5) believed there was documentary evidence locating Josquin at the French court in December 1501, with a further implication of service with Ercole d'Este at a period anterior to his appointment as maestro di cappella in 1503–4 (see below). On the occasion of the state meeting in Blois between Louis XII and Archduke Philip the Fair of Burgundy, who was en route to Spain (Ascanio Sforza, who had been released from prison, was also there with the French court), the Ferrarese ambassador Bartolomeo de' Cavalieri wrote to Ercole (13 December 1501):

> I have found here a singer named Josquin, whom your excellency had sent to Flanders to find singers … and he says that the Archduke has asked him to go along to Spain, and that the Archduke has written to your excellency to see whether you will agree to lend him.

Two factors indicate that this singer was not Josquin des Prez, however. In the first place, in a letter of September 1501 Cavalieri had mentioned that he was sending Ercole new music by Josquin, so it is unlikely he would have referred to the composer as 'a singer named Josquin'. More significantly, a singer named Josse van Steeland (recorded as 'Josquin chantre' at the court of the Duke of Lorraine in 1493) entered the Burgundian chapel at the beginning of November 1501, travelled to Spain with Philip (as Josquin did not) and remained in the chapel after Philip's death at least until 1514 (see Reese and Noble, 1984; Vander StraetenMPB, vi, vii). It is much more probable that Cavalieri was writing about Steeland.

Meetings between Louis XII and Ercole d'Este are documented in 1499 and 1502, and, if Josquin was indeed in the service of the French king, these contacts may provide a context for the composer's move to Ferrara in 1503. In the autumn of 1499 Ercole travelled to Milan to confer with Louis, who had vanquished the forces of Ludovico Sforza. This meeting presented an opportunity for Ercole and his agents to recruit new singers for his chapel; he was particularly anxious to hire a new maestro di cappella to replace Johannes Martini, who had died in 1497. In the summer of 1502 Louis XII was once more in Milan, and Ercole again journeyed to meet him. In the spring of the same year, Ercole had sent his son Alfonso to Lyons to meet with Louis XII to reassure the French of Ferrarese support. One of Ercole's agents, Girolamo da Sestola ('il Coglia'), had been sent on to Paris, where he may have had a chance to sound Josquin out about the position at Ferrara (see LockwoodMRF). Some months later, on 14 August 1502, Coglia was back in Ferrara and wrote to recommend Josquin to Ercole, who was still in Milan:

> My Lord, I believe that there is neither lord nor king who will now have a better chapel than yours if Your Lordship sends for Josquin ... and by having Josquin in our chapel I want to place a crown upon this chapel of ours.

Some two weeks later, on 2 September, an opposing view arrived from another of Ercole's agents, Gian de Artiganova, who recommended Henricus Isaac:

> To me [Isaac] seems well suited to serve Your Lordship, more so than Josquin, because he is more good-natured and companionable, and will compose new works more often. It is true that Josquin composes better, but he composes when he wants to and not when one wants him to, and he is asking 200 ducats in salary while Isaac will come for 120 – but Your Lordship will decide.

Artiganova provides a rare glimpse of Josquin's personality, indicating that he was a difficult colleague and that he took an independent attitude towards producing music for his patrons. Ercole nevertheless decided in Josquin's favour, and eagerly awaited his arrival in Ferrara in late April of 1503. The salary of 200 ducats counts as the highest ever paid to a member of the ducal chapel (see LockwoodMRF). Before departing for Ferrara in 1503 Josquin was in France, and he travelled to Italy by way of Lyons, where Louis XII was meeting with Philip the Fair. The combined chapels of the two leaders were present, as was Ascanio Sforza, Josquin's former patron. Cavalieri's dispatches to Ferrara from Lyons in mid-April 1503 reported that Coglia and Josquin had arrived and that he had found it necessary to provide lodging for them in his own house because of the crowded conditions in the city.

6. FERRARA (1503–4). Josquin served as maestro di cappella in Ferrara for almost exactly a year from late April 1503 to mid-April 1504. Little evidence concerning his activity in Ferrara survives, but in February 1504 Ercole's ambassador in Venice sent a work by an unidentified composer to be examined by Josquin 'to see if it is praiseworthy'. Not long after Josquin's arrival in Ferrara, an outbreak of plague in July 1503 caused the removal of the Este court to the coastal retreat of Comacchio. Perhaps it was the plague that prompted Josquin to depart in April 1504. His place was filled in September by Jacob Obrecht, who accepted a salary of 100 ducats, half the amount paid to Josquin. Ercole died on 25 January 1505, and the unfortunate Obrecht, who had been dismissed by the new duke, Alfonso, succumbed to the plague in Ferrara in July of the same year.

It is clear from Artiganova's advice quoted above that Josquin was expected to compose new music – probably motets and masses – for the aging Ercole, who was known for his strong religious devotion. According to Teofilo Folengo (Opus ... macaronicum, 1521), one of the composer's most famous motets, Miserere mei, Deus, a complete setting of the penitential Psalm l, was written 'at the earnest entreaty of the Duke of Ferrara'. Ercole was probably influenced in his choice of text by his correspondence with Girolamo Savonarola, whose meditation on Psalm l (which seems to have influenced Josquin's setting) was printed in Ferrara in 1498 shortly after he was burnt at the stake in Florence (see Macey, 1983, 1998). Other motets that probably date from this period are Virgo salutiferi, set to a poem by the Ferrarese court poet Ercole Strozzi, and perhaps the six-part O virgo prudentissima, on a poem by Poliziano (see Brown, 1986). Josquin's Missa 'Hercules dux Ferrariae' may also have been composed at this time, though it has features that have caused it to be dated earlier.

7. CONDÉ-SUR-L'ESCAUT (1504–21). Josquin remained active during his final years as provost of the collegiate church of Notre Dame in Condé-sur-l'Escaut. In the early 16th century Notre Dame, Condé, was ranked very highly for the quality of its music among the churches of Hainaut, surpassed only by St Vincent, Soignies, and, just to the south of Hainaut, by Cambrai Cathedral; the availability of a good choir at Condé no doubt made it an attractive place for Josquin to settle for his last and longest sojourn.

Josquin must have travelled directly from Ferrara to Condé, since he arrived there on 3 May 1504, according to a document that lists money received for admitting four canons into the chapter of Notre Dame, including 'Monsieur le Prévost, messire Josse des pres'. As provost, Josquin presided over a large establishment, including a dean, treasurer, 25 canons (mostly non-resident), 18 chaplains, 16 vicars, 6 choirboys, and non-beneficed priests. The services were sung mostly by the vicars and choirboys, so that a choir of up to 22 singers could be marshalled. Josquin's predecessor, Pierre Duwez, had agreed to resign the provostship in exchange for a similar post at Douai, which had been occupied by Loyset Compère since 1500. Compère in turn probably moved to a canonry at Saint Quentin, where he died in 1518. Josquin's election by the chapter of Notre Dame may have been due to the sponsorship of Philip the Fair, whose support he may have sought at one of the archduke's meetings with Louis XII. It should be noted that Pierre Duwez himself had been a long-time member of the Burgundian chapel, dating back to Charles the Bold's reign in 1467, and at least four other members of the Burgundian chapel of Philip the Fair held prebends or canonries at Condé.

Further evidence that Burgundian rulers sought to have their candidates appointed to positions at Condé occurs in a letter to the chapter from Margaret of Austria. After her brother Philip the Fair's death in 1506, Margaret arrived in the spring of 1507 to govern as regent in the Netherlands. The assumption of close relations between Josquin and Margaret's court in Mechelen has been questioned, because her letter to the chapter of Condé in May 1508 indicates that she was unaware that Josquin was provost. Early commentators (Delporte, 1939; Osthoff, 1962–5) interpreted her letter as an inquiry about Josquin's health and an offer to send a Dr Collauer for assistance. In fact she mistakenly believed that Pierre Duwez, who died in 1508, had remained as provost of Condé, and she was seeking the supposedly vacant position for Collauer, who was not a medical doctor but rather secretary to her father Maximilian. The chapter responded that their provost was in fact alive and in very good health, and that he was called Josquin des Prez (see Kellman, 1971).

Margaret's ignorance in May 1508 that Josquin was provost of Condé suggests that she had no part in commissioning his chanson Plus nulz regretz. This sets a poem by Jean Lemaire de Belges written for the celebration on 1 January 1508 of the earlier signing of the Treaty of Calais, arranged by Margaret to secure the marriage of her nephew Charles (the future emperor) to Mary Tudor of England (see Kellman, 1971; Picker, 1978). Margaret did write to Josquin in 1519, however, urging him to favour the election of Jehan Lommel, who was a chaplain of Philip the Fair and Charles V, to the vacant deanship in Condé (Lille, Archives Générales du Nord, B.19049, nos.40937–8).

Lemaire, who worked in France until 1503 and for Margaret of Austria from 1504 to 1512, wrote a long poem, La plainte du desiré, to commemorate the death in 1503 of the French military leader, Louis of Luxembourg. In a later version of the poem, Josquin is called upon to compose a lament based on the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and it has been supposed that the five-voice Cueurs desolez, with its cantus firmus Plorans ploravi taken from the Lamentations, is the result (see Osthoff, 1962–5). Although the original version of the Plainte called not upon Josquin but 'Hillaire' (see Picker, 1978) and Cueurs desolez is preserved only in Attaingnant's collection of Josquin's chansons published in 1549, not in the more reliable collection published by Susato (RISM 1545[15]), the style of the chanson is far closer to Josquin's than to Hylaire's; it has much in common with Mille regretz.

Recalling that Josquin had held a benefice in the diocese of Bourges from 1484 until 1489, it is intriguing to note that in September 1508 the chapter of Bourges Cathedral wrote to him seeking his services as master of the choirboys, and in September and October 1509 a member of the chapter was paid for expenses incurred for travel to 'Picardy' (probably a mistake for the adjacent Hainaut) to seek an interview with the composer (see Higgins, 1997). It is not known whether Josquin responded to the overtures from Bourges, but it is clear that he was thought to be still active and available. Other evidence of Josquin's presence in Condé is provided by negotiations carried on with the papal curia regarding the exchange of benefices in Arras in May 1509 and Tournai in January 1513 (see Sherr, 1994). Finally, in 1520, an entry in the records of Charles V notes that the emperor ordered a substantial payment to two singers from Condé – one of them called 'Joskin' – who had travelled to Brussels or Mechelen to present him with some new chansons. The singer may be Josquin des Prez (see Osthoff, 1962–5; Picker, 1978), or someone else with the same name (see Kellman, 1971). It is perhaps significant that Josquin's late chanson Mille regretz was a favourite of the emperor (see Rees, 1995).

On 23 August 1521 Josquin was visited by the mayor of Condé and other aldermen, to whom he formally declared himself a 'foreigner' (see above). He then paid the necessary tax so that his property would not revert to the feudal lord of Condé upon his death. Josquin left his goods to the chapter of Notre Dame in Condé, and a year after his death his house was sold to endow commemorative services for him. These included a Salve service on Saturdays and vigils of feasts of the Blessed Virgin, and also the performance of his own six-voice setting of the Pater noster and Ave Maria on days of processions, to be sung when the procession halted before the image of the Blessed Virgin Mary attached to the wall of Josquin's house, which stood on the market square (see Kellman, 1971). The motet's late style suggests that it was composed in Condé.

The date of Josquin's death was specified in the inscription on his tombstone:

> Chy gist Sire Josse despres
> Prevost de cheens fut jadis:
> Priez Dieu pour les trespassés
> Qui leur donne son paradis.
> Trepassa l'an 1521 le 27 d'aoust:
> Spes mea semper fuisti.

Here lies Master Josse Despres, formerly provost of this place; pray to God for the dead, that he grant them his paradise. He died in the year 1521 on 27 August. Thou hast ever been my hope.

He was buried in the church of Notre Dame at Condé, but his tomb is no longer extant; the church, sacked by Huguenots during the Wars of Religion in the late 16th century, was completely demolished in 1793 during the French Revolution. The site is today an open square planted with trees. Only in the 19th century was the inscription discovered (FétisB), in a 17th-century manuscript collection of funerary inscriptions from Flanders, Hainaut and Brabant (F-Lm 389).

8. Portrait of Josquin. Recently discovered documents reveal that the well-known woodcut of Josquin (fig.2) was almost certainly copied from a panel portrait in oil that once stood in the church of Ste Gudule, Brussels (see Haggh, 1994). Petrus Jacobi (d 1568), a canon of Ste Gudule, owned a portrait of Josquin that may have been painted while the composer was still alive. Jacobi directed in his will that this portrait should be included as one side panel of a triptych that would feature St Peter in the central panel and Jacobi himself on the opposite side; this altarpiece was to be placed near Jacobi's tomb in Ste Gudule. The portrait was installed in 1569, the year after

2. Josquin des Prez: woodcut from Petrus Opmeer's 'Opus chronographicum' (Antwerp, 1611)

Jacobi's death, but only a decade later Protestant iconoclasts destroyed the images in the church. In the Opus chronographicum, completed in 1569 but not published until 1611, Petrus Opmeer singled out the portrait of Josquin in Ste Gudule on which he based his woodcut of the composer, and approvingly referred to Josquin's 'truly virtuous face and attractive eyes'.

The masterly 'Portrait of a Musician' in the Pinacoteca Ambrosiana, Milan, often attributed to Leonardo da Vinci and painted around 1485, has been thought to depict Gaffurius, but Clercx-Lejeune (1972) attempted to identify Josquin as the sitter. The man in the picture seems to be in his 20s and is wearing secular costume, though both musicians were clerics in their 30s at the time. Clercx-Lejeune also discussed evidence that Josquin's likeness appears in Jean Perréal's fresco of the Liberal Arts in Le Puy Cathedral in Auvergne, but this has not generally been accepted by scholars.

9. Reputation. Although there are many witnesses to the enormous esteem in which Josquin was held after his death, little evidence survives to show how he was regarded during his life. The praise he received from the agents of Ercole d'Este (even the one who championed Isaac) has been quoted above. The Roman humanist Paolo Cortese awarded Josquin pre-eminence in the composition of masses (De cardinalatu, 1510; see Pirrotta, 1966). In 1496 Gaffurius cited him as one of several composers who exemplified the use of parallel 10ths between the outer parts, and he referred to him in 1508 as 'a most worthy composer' with whom he had discussed the notation of sesquialtera proportion. Aaron, in his early treatise De institutione harmonica (1516), claimed to have once been on close terms with Josquin in Florence, and referred to his use of canons and his notation of diminution. These seem to be the only references to Josquin in theoretical works of his lifetime.

Printed editions of music do more to show Josquin's pre-eminence by the beginning of the 16th century. Petrucci gave pride of place at the opening of each of his first four motet anthologies to a motet by Josquin: Ave Maria … virgo serena (Motetti A, RISM 1502[1]), O Domine Jesu Christe (Motetti B, 1503[1]), Ave Maria … benedicta tu (Motetti C, 1504[1]) and Alma redemptoris/ Ave regina (Motetti libro quarto, 1505[2]). The first collection of printed music by a single composer was Petrucci's Misse Josquin (1502), which was so successful that the printer brought out a second volume of masses in 1505 and a third in 1514 (reprinting the previous volumes each time) – no other composer merited more than one volume. The fashion for printed collections devoted to a single composer gathered momentum in the second third of the 16th century, well after Josquin's death, but in 1545 the Antwerp printer Susato published a set of his five- and six-voice chansons, most of them unknown in earlier sources but probably genuine; these were reprinted with the addition of a few doubtful chansons by Attaingnant in Paris in 1549. In 1555 the young Parisian firm of Le Roy & Ballard brought out volumes of motets devoted to the living composers Cadéac, Maillard and Sermisy, but also a volume each of motets by Mouton and Josquin. From the 1530s onwards, German publishers (especially in Nuremberg and Augsburg) published many motets under Josquin's name, a large proportion of which, however, are undoubtedly spurious.

Josquin's works continued to be sung for decades after his death. Many of his motets and masses were copied for Spanish cathedrals around the middle of the 16th century, and instrumental intabulations of his works (though beginning to appear during his lifetime) were published frequently from the 1530s into the early 1590s. Performance-related adaptations were made in the 1570s to the Cappella Sistina copies of his Missa de Beata Virgine and Mittit ad virginem (see Dean, 1993). The 17th-century writer Hémeré, our source for Josquin's connection with the church of Saint Quentin, stated that an endowment had been instituted there in the late 16th century for the singing of Josquin's Stabat mater on Fridays in Lent and at the Easter vigil (Augusta Viromanduorum, 1643; see Osthoff, 1962–5). Finally, in 1616 the choir of the Cappella Sistina was still singing Josquin's setting of Psalm xc, Qui habitat, on the second Sunday in Lent (see H.-W. Frey, Mélanges Eugène Tisserant, Rome, 1964, vi, 407).

Josquin's death called forth a number of laments, three of which were printed by Susato in his 1545 collection of Josquin's chansons. The four-voice O Mors inevitabilis by Hieronymus Vinders employs the same text as the epitaph attached to the portrait in Ste Gudule, Brussels, according to Opmeer and Franciscus Sweertius (Athenae belgicae, 1628). Another elegy, Musae Jovis, ascribed by Sweertius to Gerardus Avidius of Nijmegen, was set to music for seven voices by Benedictus Appenzeller, and for six voices by Nicolas Gombert, who employed the canonic cantus firmus Circumdederunt that Josquin himself used in Nymphes, nappés. The same cantus firmus in canon, with the addition in some sections of the words and music to 'c'est douleur non pareille' (it is a sorrow without equal) from Josquin's Faulte d'argent, is present throughout Richafort's Requiem, which thus seems to have been composed as a memorial to Josquin. Absolve, quaesumus, an anonymous, fragmentary motet for seven voices, expanding at the end to perhaps 15, is on the same funerary text (and the same canonic cantus firmus) as Josquin's own motet for six voices, and names him as the person being mourned (see Picker, 1971). A striking musical tribute from a later generation is Jacquet of Mantua's motet Dum vastos Adriae fluctus (printed in 1554[16]), the middle section of whose text includes the titles of several motets by Josquin – Praeter rerum seriem, Stabat mater, Inviolata, Salve regina and Miserere mei – setting the words to free but recognizable variants of Josquin's own music, and making it clear how highly he was regarded in Italy a generation after his death.

Much other music from the 16th century shows Josquin's continuing influence. Many works with inauthentic ascriptions are in fact deliberate imitations (some extremely successful) either of particular works of Josquin's or more generally of his manner, showing him to have had, especially in Germany, a 'classical' status supplying ideas and inspiration for younger composers (see Macey, 1993). Josquin's position as a classic affected major composers as well: in Ferrara, for example, Willaert, Rore and Vicentino incorporated the ostinato from Josquin's Miserere mei, Deus into motets based on Savonarola's meditation on Psalm l, Infelix ego (see Macey, 1983, 1998); Rore, Jacquet of Mantua, Hellinck and Escobedo composed masses on the model of the Missa 'Hercules dux Ferrariae'. More conventional homage was common as well. Both Willaert and Antoine de Févin wrote parody masses on Josquin's Mente tota, a motet from the Vultum tuum cycle. Other motets, and a few chansons as well, provided models for some two dozen parody masses. The most popular model by far was Benedicta es, the source of masses by Morales, Rore, Hesdin, Merulo, Monte, Palestrina and La Hêle as well as a parody Magnificat by Lassus.

Theorists after Josquin's death drew heavily on his works to illustrate their doctrines, reinforcing his classical or exemplary status. Pietro Aaron cited many of Josquin's works, referring to Petrucci's printed editions, in his Trattato della natura et cognitione di tutti gli tuoni (1525) and in the Supplement to his Toscanello (2/1529); Sebald Heyden printed a number of excerpts from Josquin's works to illustrate his De arte canendi (1540). But the theorist who gave Josquin the greatest prominence was Glarean (Dodecachordon, 1547), who referred to his music and that of 'other superior composers' of his generation as an 'ars perfecta'. He praised Josquin's music above all, saying, 'in this class of composers and great crowd of talented men, he stands out most particularly in talent, conscientiousness and industry', and he also noted that Josquin expressed more effectively than others the complete gamut of human emotion, so that he could be compared to Virgil. He stated that Josquin worked laboriously on his compositions, revising them and holding them back for many years before releasing them to the public. Glarean printed many entire works and he also related a number of anecdotes, making Josquin the first composer in the Western tradition about whom such stories were told.

Glarean's tale about the composition of Memor esto has already been mentioned. He also told the story of an unidentified magnate known for his procrastinating ways who had put Josquin off regarding some favour, saying 'laisse faire moy' (let me take care of it). Josquin in reply composed the Missa 'La sol fa re mi', in which the tenor wittily sings the solmization subject countless times in a variety of rhythmic forms, thus reminding the patron of his promise. The mass has been connected to Ascanio Sforza by way of an anonymous barzelletta Lassa far a mi attributed by scholars to Serafino dall'Aquila, as well as another sonnet by Serafino, La vita ormai resolvi, in which the initial letters of each section spell out 'La Sol Fa Re Mi' (see Lowinsky, 1971). The circumstantial evidence linking Josquin's mass to Ascanio may, however, constitute no more than a coincidence involving a common pun on solmization syllables (see Haar, 1971). It has alternatively been proposed that Josquin composed the Missa 'La sol fa re mi' while he was a member of the papal chapel. In the earliest source for the mass (I-Rvat C.S.41, copied *c*1495), an illustration depicts a man in Turkish costume, who holds a banner with the words 'lesse faire a mi'. The illumination may represent the Turkish prince Cem [Djem], a political prisoner of the pope, who repeatedly declared his wish to participate in a crusade and overturn his brother, the Sultan Bayezid II (see Kiang, 1992). If so, Josquin may have written his mass to evoke the promises of the Turkish prince to aid the West in a proposed crusade against Constantinople, perhaps on the occasion of the papal Mass in S Pietro on 10 January 1495, attended by Cem, Pope Alexander VI and King Charles VIII of France (see R. Stewart: disc notes, Josquin des Prez: Missa 'Lesse faire a mi', Ricercar 159166, 1996).

Glarean related another anecdote that has long been associated with Josquin, although he did not name him explicitly but introduced the story after mentioning Josquin in connection with similar jests. At the end of the Dodecachordon Glarean presented a 'Carmen gallicum', recounting how Louis XII, in spite of his weak voice, wished the master of his chapel to compose a piece in which he could take part. The composer complied with a little work based on a single long note for the king's part, reinforced by leaping 5ths in the bass and two voices in a simple canon above. The king laughed heartily at the joke and rewarded the composer for his efforts. While Glarean presented the work untexted, it survives with the words 'Guillaume se va chauffer' in the Heer Liederbuch, copied in Paris in 1510 (CH-SGs 462). Here it is also anonymous, and bears an inscription connecting it with King Louis XI, who died in 1483. In the 17th century Marin Mersenne did attribute the work to Josquin (MersenneHU, 'Traitez de la voix, et des chants', pp.44–5), but he may have been inferring a connection not intended by Glarean.

Other anecdotes are related by Johannes Manlius, a Lutheran humanist educated in the Erasmian circle in Basel (Locorum communium collectanea, 1562). He stated that whenever Josquin composed a new work he would give it to the choir to sing, and then walk about listening to the harmony. Whenever he heard something that displeased him, he would say: 'Be silent; I will change that.' Manlius also reported that Josquin could be harsh: when a singer introduced ornaments into one of his works, he entered the choir and said: 'You donkey, why did you add embellishments? If I had wanted them, I would have written them myself. If you wish to correct musical works that have been composed in a natural or plain style, then write your own, but leave my works unaltered.' On a lighter note, the Neapolitan composer Giovan Tomaso Cimello told how Josquin had given the tenor part from his Missa 'L'homme armé' super voces musicales to a singer who did not understand that the notation called for augmentation and proceeded to perform it incorrectly. After laughing a good deal, Josquin explained the correct manner of singing the tenor (see Haar, 1990).

Cimello had heard the story from Jean Lhéritier, who he said was a pupil of Josquin. Nicolas Gombert was also called a pupil of Josquin by the theorist Hermann Finck (Practica musica, 1556), who noted that Josquin's music was somewhat 'bare', owing to the frequent rests and duet textures, while Gombert created a fuller texture based on pervading imitation. Ronsard claimed 10 major composers as Josquin's 'disciples' (preface to Meslange de chansons, 1560). None of these statements is supported by further evidence, though it is very likely that each of the other composers had some contact with Josquin. This cannot be said of Adrian Petit Coclico, an unreliable self-promoter (he falsely claimed to have been a singer in the papal chapel, for instance) who advertised himself as a pupil of Josquin. In his Compendium musices (1552), however, he gave a credible description of Josquin's method of teaching (trans. adapted from Smijers, 1926–7):

> My teacher Josquin ... never gave a lecture on music or wrote a theoretical work, and yet he was able in a short time to form complete musicians, because he did not keep back his pupils with long and useless instructions but taught them the rules in a few words, through practical application in the course of singing. And as soon as he saw that his pupils were well grounded in singing, had a good enunciation and knew how to embellish melodies and fit the text to the music, then he taught them the perfect and imperfect intervals and the different methods of inventing counterpoints against plainsong. If he discovered, however, pupils with an ingenious mind and promising disposition, then he would teach these in a few words the rules of three-part and later of four-, five-, and six-part writing, always providing them with examples to imitate. Josquin did not, however, consider all suited to learn composition; he judged that only those should be taught who were drawn to this delightful art by a special natural impulse.

Writers in Italy singled out Josquin for praise. Baldassare Castiglione (Il libro del cortegiano, 1528) related that a motet performed at the court of the Duchess of Urbino pleased no one until it was discovered that Josquin composed it. Cosimo Bartoli (Ragionamenti accademici, 1567) juxtaposed Ockeghem and Josquin with two great Florentine artists (trans. from Haar, 1988):

I well know that Ockeghem was practically the first who in earlier times rediscovered music, which had become almost completely extinct, no differently than Donatello, who for his part rediscovered sculpture; and Josquin, a pupil of Ockeghem, may be regarded in music as a prodigy of nature, just as was our Michelangelo Buonarroti in architecture, painting and sculpture. Just as Josquin has so far had no one who could surpass him in composition, so Michelangelo, among all those who have cultivated these arts, stands alone and without peer. Both of them have opened the eyes of all who take delight in these arts, or who will enjoy them in the future.

Zarlino, however, although granting Josquin the highest rank among composers of his own time, held that he was 'not to be compared with Horace or any other excellent ancient poet, Greek or Latin' (Sopplimenti musicali, 1588, p.314).

In France, Rabelais placed Josquin at the head of a long list of composers, even giving him precedence over Ockeghem (Nouveau prologue ... Pantagruel, 1552).

In Germany, Luther delivered a famous judgment on Josquin during one of his table talks in 1538, making particular reference to Josquin's six-part Nymphes, nappés, built around a canonic cantus firmus on Circumdederunt me gemitus mortis. Luther performed the work with some friends in the widespread contrafact version Haec dicit Dominus, and after singing it through he exclaimed:

Josquin is the master of the notes, which must do as he wishes, while other composers must follow what the notes dictate. He most certainly possessed a great spirit ... particularly since he was able to work Haec dicit Dominus and Circumdederunt together so effectively and melodiously.

Luther went on to express the wish that this motet might be performed at his deathbed. Luther is probably also the source of the wry comment that 'now that Josquin is dead, he is putting out more works than when he was still alive' (see Osthoff, 1962–5, ii, 9).

While Josquin's fame eventually receded, he was never entirely forgotten in the 17th and 18th centuries. His works are intelligently discussed in Angelo Berardi's theoretical writings of the 1680s and 1690s, for instance, and there is a brief entry on him in Johann Gottfried Walther's Musikalisches Lexikon (1732). But he was restored to a position of prominence in the new historicizing climate of the late 18th century: Burney scored various works by him, analysed the music and arrived at remarkably sound judgments. Josquin looms large in Kiesewetter's and Fétis's pioneering studies of Netherlandish music, and in the 1860s Ambros declared Josquin to be one of the towering figures of Western music history, not merely a forerunner of Palestrina but his equal. With the publication of Josquin's complete works beginning in the 1920s, chiefly edited by Albert Smijers, and the contemporaneous advocacy by Friedrich Blume in the series Das Chorwerk, a concrete knowledge of his music came to confirm his position at the centre of 20th-century understanding of 15th- and 16th-century music. That position has been reaffirmed by Osthoff's monograph of 1962–5, by the international festival-conference of 1971 to mark the 450th anniversary of Josquin's death, whose moving spirit was Edward E. Lowinsky, by a number of subsequent volumes of essays and many individual articles devoted to Josquin and his music, and by a new critical edition that began publication in 1987.

10. Works: canon and chronology. That Josquin was the greatest composer of the high Renaissance, the most varied in invention and the most profound in expression, has become almost a commonplace of musical history, thanks to the work of scholars such as those mentioned above and of the steadily increasing number of performers who have helped, both in concert and through their recordings, to make his music known to modern listeners. In some quarters this has provoked, perhaps inevitably, something like a revisionist backlash, not only against Josquin's reputation but also against a scholarly mindset that is seen as having fostered it too unquestioningly.

It is undoubtedly true that early generations of music historians were hampered by an incomplete knowledge of the surviving sources – something that has only been remedied by the completion of the University of Illinois's Census-Catalogue in 1988. It would be unwarranted, however, to deduce from this that previous attempts to establish a canon of Josquin's authentic works were naively uncritical. There is still plenty of room for doubt in individual cases, and in the revised work-list at the end of the present article indications of scholarly disagreement have been given both among those works the authors consider probably authentic and among those they do not. It must be emphasized that all scholars acknowledge a continuum of degrees of doubt between the extremes of those works generally accepted as certainly by Josquin and those recognized as certainly not by him; the main work-list is not confined to the former extreme but also includes many works the authors regard as probably but not certainly authentic, and a fair number of compositions are finely balanced between 'probably' and 'probably not'.

The degree of scepticism employed in attempting to establish the authenticity of individual works will depend on the experience and temperament of the individual scholar, and must thus be to some extent subjective. Moreover, the evidence (whether it concerns the dating and reliability of sources, or the availability of biographical data) will itself usually remain incomplete and uncertain, and hence subject to interpretation. Whatever consensus emerges through the interaction of informed opinions will and should remain fluid, capable of accommodating new evidence, both internal and external – new archival discoveries, new insights into the music. A case in point is the fundamental one of Josquin's date of birth (see §1 above).

It has also been maintained that Josquin's legendary supremacy among his contemporaries was essentially a creation of the 16th century, and that his high standing among modern musicologists rests on an attempt to perpetuate, or even enhance, an anachronistic view of him. Wegman in particular (1994 and in Sherr, forthcoming) has claimed that Josquin's celebrity during his lifetime, or at least until the middle of the first decade of the 16th century, was considerably less than Obrecht's, though the latter has been less highly regarded ever since. Yet the nature of and grounds for compositorial fame before the second quarter of the 16th century are little understood. It is true that Josquin's reputation was to benefit more than Obrecht's from the effect of printing technology on the transmission of music and music theory, but the histories of their employment do not suggest that he had been any less highly regarded during their lifetimes. In contrast to Obrecht, Josquin was essentially a court musician, who by 1504 had been in the service of René of Anjou, Cardinal Ascanio Sforza, the dukes of Milan and Ferrara, Popes Innocent VIII and Alexander VI, and perhaps two kings of France; thereafter he spent the last 17 years of his life as provost of Condé. This scarcely looks like the career of an unregarded composer.

In any case Josquin's high standing in modern times rests not on the gullible repetition of received ideas, but on the direct experience of a sizable body of music very plausibly attributed to him. If a total, organic picture of his creative development has been slow to appear, and has still, two decades after the previous edition of this dictionary, not come into sharp focus, the reasons are not far to seek. Josquin's productive career was a long one, perhaps as much as 50 years, and the quantity of his music that survives (even discounting the works doubtfully ascribed to him) is greater than that of any other composer of the period with the possible exceptions of Isaac and Obrecht. But the sources in which this music survives give relatively little help with its chronology. Music printing made its appearance only in the last two decades of Josquin's life; unlike later 16th-century publications, moreover, which almost always made a point of the novelty of their contents, Petrucci's earliest collections, both sacred and secular, are clearly anthologies drawn from the repertory of the previous 20 or even 30 years. For Josquin, the dates of Petrucci's publications provide only a terminus ante quem: how new or old a given composition may have been when it was published is something that has to be decided on other evidence. More surprising, perhaps, is the lack of information to be derived from manuscript sources. Time, war and enthusiasm (both religious and anti-religious) have wrought such destruction on the musical material of the later 15th century that very few manuscript copies of music by Josquin survive from before 1500. Yet the body of his surviving work is so large and so diverse that we cannot conveniently posit the loss of all his early music; some of it at least must be contained in these comparatively 'late' sources, though they themselves fail to provide an accurate date for its composition.

The works themselves also provide very little external historical evidence for dates of composition. The isorhythmic celebratory motets for specific and identifiable occasions, which provide such useful signposts in the generation of Dunstaple and Du Fay, had gone out of fashion by Josquin's time, and he seems to have been less attracted to occasional texts than his contemporaries Isaac and Mouton. Various topical references have been suggested by Osthoff, Lowinsky, Macey and others, and some of them may well be correct; but few have won universal acceptance. The elegy on the death of Ockeghem, Nymphes des bois, was presumably written soon after that event (February 1497), and Osthoff's association of the chanson Plus nulz regretz with the celebrations for the Treaty of Calais (New Year 1508) seems fully justified. However, Glarean's anecdotes associating particular works with particular patrons (Ascanio Sforza, Louis XII) could only be really useful if the facts of Josquin's life were more precisely known than they yet are. More definite, since it refers to a more restricted period, is Teofilo Folengo's information that the great psalm setting Miserere mei, Deus was composed at the request of Ercole d'Este, presumably, therefore, between April 1503 and April 1504, when Josquin was in his service at Ferrara, or at the latest by the following year, when Ercole died (see also §6 above).

The external evidence, then, is meagre, and yet for all its undoubted difficulty the question of chronology must be tackled, however speculatively, if the course of Josquin's development is to be understood. There is in fact little disagreement about its broad outlines. Commentators such as Ambros, Ursprung, Blume and Osthoff have all remarked on a move away from exuberant melisma towards motifs closely, often syllabically, related to the text; on the development of a technique of structural imitation among voices of equivalent importance that combines a rational and homogeneous integration of the musical space with a self-renewing rhythmic impetus; on a growing preoccupation with verbal texts, and on the development of a melodic and harmonic vocabulary capable of expressing their meaning in a totally new way. Through these developments Josquin's music, more than that of any other composer, represents the transition from the world of Du Fay and Ockeghem to that of Willaert, Arcadelt and, eventually, Lassus and Palestrina.

Points of departure and arrival are clear enough; the stages of the journey have proved less easy to map convincingly. Ambros (1887–1911) recognized in Josquin's output the traditional three periods – early, middle and late – roughly corresponding to apprenticeship, maturity and the individual mastery that distinguishes only the last years of great composers. In dealing with the masses, in particular, Osthoff (1962–5) attempted to give these periods more specific technical and temporal definition. For him the first period (lasting until about 1485, the year – as he thought – before Josquin's entry into the papal chapel) is characterized mainly by a rather abstract, melismatic counterpoint, perhaps deriving from Ockeghem, in which the relationship between verbal and musical phraseology is tenuous and inconsistent; the second period (ending about 1505, when Josquin had returned from Italy and settled at Condé-sur-l'Escaut) saw the development and perfection of the technique of imitation based on word-generated motifs; in the final period, lasting until Josquin's death, the relationship between word and note becomes closer than ever, and there is an increasing emphasis on declamation and rhetorical expression within a style characterized by the utmost economy.

So far as it goes, this categorization is convincing, though it is beginning to look somewhat over-schematic. Osthoff saw the mature, middle-period style as a synthesis of two traditions: the northern polyphony of Du Fay, Busnoys and Ockeghem in which Josquin presumably had his earliest training (see §1 above for the connection with Ockeghem) and the more chordal, harmonically orientated practice of Italy, as exemplified in improvised falsobordone and lauda. He also accepted the traditional view that this process must have begun in the 1470s, when (as was then thought) Josquin and several of his most talented contemporaries were gathered together in the lavish musical establishment of Galeazzo Maria Sforza (d December 1476) at Milan. Against this Lowinsky (1963) argued that our knowledge of the laude and their composers does not permit the assumption that such an influence existed before the 1490s; thus it would follow that such pieces as the Elevation motet Tu solus qui facis mirabilia and the Passiontide cycle O Domine Jesu Christe, both almost entirely homophonic in texture, would belong not to the Milanese years but to the later Roman ones. Now that Josquin's connection with Milan has been, if not disproved, at least attenuated, a clear-cut temporal distinction between horizontally and vertically orientated pieces must be abandoned. Josquin had evidently learnt to mingle the two from an early date, and the only distinction to be made is between the levels of control which he displayed in doing so.

11. MOTETS.

(i) Early and middle-period works. Ave Maria ... virgo serena was chosen by Petrucci to stand at the head of his first motet collection, Motetti A (1502), but it must already have been at least 20 years old at the time. Clearly it owes its position, and its evident popularity, to the way in which it was felt to typify the perfection of a particular style, which we can identify with that of Josquin's early maturity. It therefore seems appropriate, before embarking on a selective survey of his work in this field (following, in the main, Osthoff's periodization), to start with some account of it, if only to suggest the distance he had already travelled by about 1480. Its apparent simplicity conceals great subtlety and technical mastery. The basic texture is imitative, yet each section of the text is given a slightly different treatment. For the opening words of the angelic salutation there is literal imitation at the octave or unison, working (no doubt with symbolic intent) from the highest voice to the lowest; each phrase overlaps its predecessor, but in such a way that all four voices are heard together only in the three bars before the first main cadence. For the first strophe of the rhyming votive antiphon that follows, a duet of upper voices is imitated by a trio of lower ones, leading more quickly this time into a longer full section whose denser texture is enlivened by sequence and close internal imitation; for the second strophe, duets of lower and upper voices, now imitating one another at the 5th, converge briefly to form a four-part texture, which then tapers away to the unrelieved duet of the third strophe. This temporary austerity enhances the effect of the crucial fourth strophe, 'Ave vera virginitas', whose four-part texture is given new rhythmic life by a change of metre; the close canon between superius and tenor may symbolize the Child within the Virgin's womb. After a fifth strophe in which this almost purely harmonic texture is resolved into melodic imitation once more, the motet ends, after a whole bar's pause, with a chordal invocation of stark simplicity. The musical form precisely mirrors that of the text, yet without any sense of constraint; articulation is achieved by subtle changes of procedure and texture, but with no loss of onward momentum in spite of the fact that every main cadence falls on C – though that is something Josquin might not have permitted himself in later years.

The frequent imitative duets that give this motet its characteristic transparency recur as a favourite device in Josquin's music, early and late. That they do not occur at all in the first section of the four-part setting of the Easter sequence Victimae paschali laudes, also published in Motetti A, suggests that this may be one of his earliest surviving motets. As Glarean pointed out, it is an ingenious piece in that it combines the plainsong melody (mostly in the tenor, but occasionally migrating to the two other lower voices) with the superius of two well-known chansons, first Ockeghem's D'ung aultre amer and then Hayne van Ghizeghem's De tous biens playne; yet the texture is uncharacteristically dense and is articulated by scarcely a trace of imitation until the lengthy duet that begins the second part. Patches of stagnant rhythm and a hole in the texture near the end which leaves the top voice momentarily isolated confirm the impression that this motet belongs to Josquin's prentice years. Similar details of dissonance treatment and rhythm in at least some of its movements suggest that the motet cycle Vultum tuum deprecabuntur (clearly a set of motetti missales, to judge by both text and structure) must also be reckoned among Josquin's early works. Whether or not it was written in Milan (see §3 above), its style is very comparable to that of the cycles of motetti missales known to have been composed for that city. However, the first and last sections of the version printed by Petrucci in 1505 do not appear in the earlier manuscript source known to have been copied in Milan (I-Md 4 [2266]), and they may have been added to make a cycle of Marian motets more specifically appropriate for use in the mass; these sections relate, the first through quotation of text and chant, the last by its text and structure, to Introit and Agnus Dei respectively. Macey (1989) has plausibly argued that Ave Maria ... benedicta tu, which Petrucci placed at the beginning of his Motetti C (1504), may also belong to this cycle, though it appears in none of the surviving Milanese sources. A second Passiontide motet cycle, however, seems more advanced in style than O Domine Jesu Christe, mentioned above. Qui velatus facie fuisti (on a rhymed Office attributed to St Bonaventure) has a swifter harmonic movement and a more varied texture; only one section, 'Honor et benedictio', is purely homophonic, and in this it presents an analogy (see §12 below) with the Elevation motet Tu solus qui facis mirabilia – indeed, it reappears as an Elevation motet within the separately printed Sanctus de Passione. The association of chordal writing of this kind with moments of particular solemnity and devotion remains a feature of Josquin's style even in works that belong indisputably to his last years (cf the 'Et incarnatus est' of the Missa 'Pange lingua' and the words 'Et verbum caro factum est' in the motet In principio).

Earlier than any of these at first sight are two motets that both begin in the old-fashioned perfect or triple time and with long melismatic duets of a kind that could almost have been written by Du Fay. Alma Redemptoris mater/Ave regina celorum combines paraphrases of both plainsong antiphons, Ave regina in the two equal middle voices, Alma Redemptoris in the outer ones; there is fairly consistent imitation between the pairs of voices based on the same material, but a rather heavy reliance on scalic note-spinning. Formally very similar, but musically more accomplished, is the five-part 'signed' motet Illibata Dei virgo nutrix, whose text presents Josquin's name as an acrostic. Although the style and texture of its prima pars, in particular, seem to look back to that of Johannes Regis, it has been plausibly suggested that this may relate to a vogue for such works in the papal chapel even as late as the time (1489 onwards) when Josquin was a member (see Sherr, 1988). Whether early or relatively late, it shows remarkable mastery of a style that would at first sight seem rather old-fashioned for him. The structure is articulated, not only texturally, by the contrast between duets and full sections, whose alternation is gradually telescoped, but also by the presence of a transposing three-note pes or ostinato cantus firmus, sung in the tenor to a solmization of the word 'Maria'. Jejune as this phrase is in itself (it appears alternately as D–A–D and G–D–G), Josquin's use of it looks ahead to preoccupations and procedures that recur in later large-scale works: the gradual speeding-up of the statements, for instance, which can be seen as a last vestige of the old isorhythmic tradition but is here used to achieve a climactic integration, not only musical but also textual, with the other voices (cf Ave nobilissima creatura and O virgo prudentissima, both among Josquin's maturest masterpieces); the clearly articulated solo and full sections; the concern for metrical variety; and not least the readiness to use straightforward musical repetition (here of a whole 12-bar clause) to build up the intensity of the final invocation to the Virgin. Though the range and abruptness of its stylistic contrasts make it probable that Illibata is a relatively early work, it already shows a mastery of at least one of the features in which Josquin is pre-eminent among his contemporaries: a control of large-scale musical architecture.

As a five-part work on a cantus firmus, however, Illibata stands slightly to one side of the main line of development leading to the homogeneous imitative texture displayed in Ave Maria ... virgo serena. More relevant stages are marked by Virgo prudentissima, Missus est Gabriel angelus and the cycle of antiphons for the Circumcision, O admirabile commercium, which may betray a lack of complete maturity in its exclusive reliance on imitative texture. Gaude virgo, mater Christi, on the other hand, with its climactic move into near-homophony and its relatively close matching of words and notes, closely resembles Ave Maria ... virgo serena.

Perhaps even more impressive are three motets (all published in Motetti C, 1504) that show Josquin's ability to set a long text in prose without recourse either to a cantus-firmus scaffolding or to more than a bare minimum of plainsong reference; here the music derives its shape and its self-renewing impetus only from the free flow of original musical ideas. Liber generationis and Factum est autem may well be companion-pieces. They are settings of the genealogies of Christ taken from St Matthew's and St Luke's gospels and sung, before the Tridentine reforms, at Matins of Christmas and Epiphany respectively. In each, Josquin's only musical datum was a repetitive reciting-tone, and the variety with which he contrived to invest a singularly uninspiring text is astonishing. It seems likely that these two motets were composed for a chapel north of the Alps, even though the Matthew setting was eventually copied into a papal choirbook; the Luke setting makes use of a chant that is known to have been used at the royal abbey of St Martin at Tours, and rarely elsewhere. The inescapable element of tour de force in these two huge pieces, as well as their reliance on melodic means of structural control, points to a relatively early date.

Equally striking but more difficult to date (because more untypical and perhaps even inauthentic) are two pieces that must surely have been composed as funeral commemorations of some kind. In the setting of David's lament for Saul and Jonathan, Planxit autem David, the predominantly homophonic texture of the Passiontide motets is combined and varied with freely imitative passages, out of which the Holy Week lamentation tone emerges in long notes like a ritual keening. Josquin's authorship has been challenged (Finscher in Sherr, forthcoming) on the grounds of its untypicality, but since it is at least as untypical of the other composer, Ninot le Petit, to whom it is ascribed, it may perhaps be allowed to stand as another experimental venture by the younger Josquin. Shorter, but even more expressive, is another lament of David, Absalon, fili mi, which may commemorate the death of Pope Alexander VI's son in 1497 or of the Emperor Maximilian I's in 1506. Freely composed, it achieves its effect through a typically flexible combination of textures; set at an unusually low pitch (in the original notation the bass descends at the end to B♭′) and in an unusually flat transposition, the concluding sequence moves the music still further flatwards – a passage that may have been the starting-point for more far-reaching tonal experiments by Willaert and the later 16th-century exponents of musica reservata. Once again, however, the work's authenticity has been questioned, and this time, it must be admitted, with more plausibility: the only ascription to Josquin dates from 20 years after his death, and the music's style, though exceptional by any standard, has perhaps more to do with that of La Rue (the proposed author) than Josquin's.

(ii) The later works. The motets that belong, so far as external and internal evidence suggests, to the last 20 years of Josquin's life exist on a high plateau of mastery where technical means are subordinated to formal and expressive ends; so far as any continuing development can be detected, it is in the direction of still further motivic density and melodic succinctness (though extended melismas reappear at times), together with formal clarity. They fall into two main groups: settings of biblical texts, mostly from the Psalms and freely composed in four parts, and large-scale five- or six-part works based on cantus firmi, in which Josquin seems to have discovered a renewed interest in his later years.

Whereas most of these cantus firmi are drawn from the repertory of plainsong, in which Josquin's imagination was clearly steeped, Stabat mater is based on the tenor of Binchois' symbolically appropriate chanson Comme femme desconfortée, sung or played straight through in doubled note-values (allowing for the original's undiminished perfect mensuration). In contrast to this apparently archaic procedure, the remaining voices are in Josquin's most modern manner, their rhythms and phrasing declamatory, with the minim as the basic note value. This piece could only be by Josquin, but Lowinsky (MRM, iii, 1968, p.223) was surely right to deny the authenticity of the only other motet attributed to him (and strongly) in which the cantus firmus has similar characteristics, a five-part setting of Missus est Gabriel; here the tenor is borrowed from Busnoys' A une dame j'ay faict veu, but the remaining voices are quite uncharacteristic of Josquin in their lack of imitative integration. Another exceptional cantus firmus is that of Miserere mei, Deus, composed, as has been mentioned above (in §§6 and 10), for Ercole d'Este. Here the two-pitch phrase to which the opening words are sung is shifted step by step – first downwards through an octave, then, in the second part of the motet, up again, and finally down a 5th to rest on A. Between its appearances, which usually coincide with a passage of full five-part texture, various smaller groups propound the verses of the long penitential psalm text; into these the phrase 'Miserere mei Deus' strikes like the refrain of a litany (or – as Macey, 1983, showed – like the reiteration in a meditation of Savonarola's), though varied in both pitch and interval, since the modal structure ensures that it covers sometimes a tone, sometimes a semitone.

Two further motets, of very different character, provide something of a puzzle. One is Huc me sydereo, a setting of elegiacs by the humanist Maffeo Veggio in which Christ speaks from the cross of the divine love that brought him there and the love he demands from mankind in return; the other is Ave nobilissima creatura, a vastly expanded version of the angelic salutation to the Virgin. Their cantus firmi are identical (apart from a single repeated note) in both pitch and rhythm, though they bear different texts, respectively 'Plangent eum quasi unigenitum' and 'Benedicta tu in mulieribus' (cf Elders, 1971). Both undergo quasi-isorhythmic diminution in the secundae partes, though the proportional speeding-up is more gradual in the latter (6 : 4 : 2) than in the former (6 : 2 : 1), no doubt in order to accommodate a longer text and to engineer the climactic coincidence of the tenor's antiphon text with that of the motet at 'Benedicta tu in mulieribus'. One might imagine, from the virtual identity of the two cantus firmi, that Josquin had here deliberately composed a contrasting pair of motets if the sixth voice missing in two important sources of Huc were not an obvious addition to the original texture, while Ave nobilissima was clearly conceived from the start in six parts. The explanation may be that Huc was composed first, for five voices, and that Josquin, later wishing to provide a companion-piece (perhaps for some dramatic performance representing both the Annunciation and the Cruxifixion), devised the text of Ave nobilissima (the words 'Ave Maria gratia plena, Dominus tecum' are placed precisely so that the tenor's entry with 'benedicta tu in mulieribus' will complete them) and also added a sixth voice to the earlier Huc me sydereo to increase the symmetry between the two motets. Placidly beautiful as the Annunciation motet is, that for the Crucifixion makes the deeper impression. The sophistication of the text is fully matched in Josquin's setting, which abounds in affective devices and word-painting: the melodic descent from the trebles' highest note to the basses' lowest to illustrate Christ's descent from 'Olympus'; the plangent fall of a 3rd to emphasize such words as 'crudeli' and 'durae' (a hallmark of Josquin's later style); the repeated phrase at 'verbera tanta pati' (singled out for its pathos by the publisher Hans Ott in the preface to the second part of his Novum et insigne opus musicum, 1538); and a constant attention to clear and effective declamation.

In both these motets, as we have seen, the cantus firmus is gradually speeded up to converge with the tempo of the surrounding voices, a feature already encountered in Illibata. The beautiful five-part Salve regina takes up another feature of that seminal work, the controlled oscillation of a motif (this time the distinctive four-note phrase that begins the relevant plainsong) between pitches a 4th apart. More commonly, though, Josquin achieved a similar effect by a canonic treatment of the cantus firmus, sometimes combined with a progressive reduction in note values. This may be rather freely handled, as in Virgo salutiferi, a work very probably written at Ferrara, since its text is by a Ferrarese court poet, Ercole Strozzi (see §6 above). Here the superius and tenor at first present only the beginning of the angelic salutation 'Ave Maria gratia plena, Dominus tecum' with repetitions, in canon at the octave; in the second section the reduction of note values is nearly proportional, but the repetitions are removed; in the course of the last the cantus firmus is still further compressed and the salutation completed. In Benedicta es, caelorum regina the canon is once more at the octave, but free in its time interval and in other details. More usually, though, the canon is at the 5th, as in Inviolata, integra et casta, and in the transparently beautiful setting of Poliziano's Latin poem O virgo prudentissima.

In the freely composed Praeter rerum seriem, as in a number of probably inauthentic works clearly modelled on it, plainsong melodies well known in Josquin's day are highlighted by the use of long note-values, but in some of the very last motets they are presented in canon but dissolved, as it were, into the general texture, so that their structural function is hardly apparent to the listener. This is true, for instance, of the linked Pater noster and Ave Maria (a work not so much austere as sombre, which Kellman's research at Condé (1971) has shown to be Josquin's own musical memorial) and of the magnificent five-part De profundis, where the mourning of the three estates of the realm is symbolized by a canon at the 4th and the octave below. In all these works the canons perform a multiple function, partly symbolic, partly structural. As the strictest form of imitation they produce, on a larger scale, the same kind of textural integration as does the imitation between contrapuntal motifs. At the 5th, moreover, they help to ensure a certain alternation of tonal centre and thus to provide a controlled variety in the settings of large-scale texts (and not only large-scale ones, as can be seen in the late five- and six-part chansons, discussed in §13 below).

Compared with a series of masterpieces such as these, it must be admitted that the other main category of apparently late works, the psalm settings, shows no such uniformity of excellence. The best of them – Memor esto verbi tui, for instance, or the setting for low voices of Domine, ne in furore tuo – are characterized by the same dense, and tense, motivic development, the same close attention to declamation and an even more vivid response to the meaning of the words. It may be noted that the two works mentioned both occur in sources printed in Josquin's lifetime, the first and third books of Petrucci's Motetti de la corona (1514, 1519) respectively. Many of the rest were first printed in Petreius's psalm collections (Nuremberg, 1538, 1539 and 1542) some 20 years after Josquin's death, and it is perhaps in order to view them with a certain scepticism – a scepticism incorporated more unflinchingly into the accompanying work-list than into its predecessor in the previous edition of this dictionary. Works like Usquequo Domine and Caeli enarrant present some of the more obvious features of the 'Josquin style', notably his paired duets, but in comparison with the works already discussed their motivic development seems short-breathed and mechanical and their four-part writing often rhythmically congested and clumsy (Caeli enarrant, furthermore, quotes passages from three of Josquin's motets at the opening of each of its partes, encouraging the supposition that it was modelled on Josquin by an unknown composer; see Macey, 1986). Even a work such as Benedicite omnia opera, which has a far more consistent impetus than most and contains several distinctive features, such as the harmonic oscillation at 'glacies et nives', shows an untypical squareness of rhythm and an overinsistent density of imitation. The solecism of word-setting (at bar 131), which it is hard to imagine the mature Josquin permitting himself, is perhaps due to an easily corrected misprint.

For a superb example of Josquin's late four-part style – as definitive in its way as the Ave Maria is for the early period – we need look no further than In principio erat verbum, which stands first in an incomplete set of partbooks (A-Wn Mus.15941) copied in the Netherlandish court workshop for Raimund Fugger (and containing two more, probably authentic, psalm settings, In exitu Israel and Qui habitat in adiutorio). The texture is as transparent as ever, with its preponderance of duets, and characteristically it makes continuous reference to the underlying recitation tone, but with a variety of texture and an impetus informing the austerity that enables it to cover 14 verses of St John's gospel with no trace of monotony. Sparks (1971) has convincingly demonstrated the inauthenticity, on stylistic grounds, of a group of five- and six-part motets, three of which first appear in even later German publications; perhaps, with the touchstone of In principio to hand, it may be possible to subject the posthumously published psalms to a similar critical scrutiny. If so, it must surely be recognized that most are no more than a well-intentioned attempt to cater for the new Lutheran market with works supposedly by Luther's favourite composer. But fortunately a large enough body of authentic motets will remain to prove that he was indeed 'the master of the notes' that Luther called him.

12. MASSES. Josquin's motets, with their exceptionally wide-ranging choice of texts, show him at his most varied, yet as a whole they can be regarded as an appendix to the liturgy rather than as an essential part of it. Much work remains to be done on the liturgical practice of Josquin's day, but it seems likely that apart from the Mass itself polyphony was still generally confined (at least outside Germany) to the more peripheral parts of the services – hymns, Magnificat settings, antiphons for Vespers, for Compline or for votive Offices of the Virgin; the remainder of the prescribed texts would still be sung in plainsong, with or without the collaboration of the organ. But for some half a century the practice of singing the five main sections of the Ordinary of the Mass (Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus and Agnus Dei) as a musically related cycle had been growing in the major collegiate churches and princely chapels. This development corresponded roughly with the lifetime of Du Fay, in whose later masses the essential outlines of the form are fully developed and some of its characteristic procedures explored. It was confined at first to the greatest occasions of church and state, but it gained ground rapidly, and by the end of the century it had become a common, perhaps even daily, occurrence in churches that boasted a professional band of singers.

The demand was great, and so too was the challenge to the composer: on the liturgical level, that of worthily adorning the Christian Church's central rite; musically, that of reconciling the claims of unity and diversity within a span of music lasting in all some half an hour or more. Thus stimulated, the best composers of Josquin's generation consciously vied with one another in following up the implications of mass settings by such acknowledged masters as Du Fay and Ockeghem. If Josquin's own contribution to the form seems as a whole less forward-looking in style than his motets, this could be because the bulk of the masses were composed a little earlier in his career but also, even more probably, because of the inherent nature of the task, which places as much emphasis on structure as on expression. Although fewer of his masses survive than those of such close contemporaries as Isaac, Obrecht and La Rue, the fact that Petrucci, in his series of mass publications, chose to start with Josquin and to devote three volumes to works by (or at least attributed to) him indicates that by the beginning of the the 16th century his supremacy in the field was widely acknowledged. This supremacy was based on his ability, at least in his mature masses, to combine an inexhaustible constructive power with a wealth of detailed invention that very rarely becomes completely abstract, even if it does not aim at the detailed expressiveness found in some of the motets.

(i) Individual mass sections. As well as full-scale masses, Josquin, like other composers of the time, seems to have composed a number of isolated mass sections, perhaps for more modest occasions or establishments. Several are to be found in Petrucci's Fragmenta missarum (1505). Some of these, however, are found with conflicting attributions in manuscript sources, and it may be noted that only two are ascribed to Josquin in the body of Petrucci's text (superius volume); the remainder are given to him only in the index which precedes each partbook. Of those which may, on stylistic grounds, be reasonably accepted as Josquin's, the Gloria de Beata Virgine (based on Gloria IX, including the tropes that were soon to be abolished by the Tridentine reforms) shows vigour and imagination in its range of rhythmic contrast and bold use of sequence, though the frequent use of incomplete triads points to an early date. The Credo 'De tous biens' is also independently attributed to Josquin in an early Sistine Chapel manuscript (I-Rvat C.S.41), and although its dissonance treatment and its excessively bald use of the tenor of Hayne's chanson seem uncharacteristic of the mature Josquin, a case can be made for its representing the deliberate confrontation of a specific compositional challenge, namely the combination of a plainchant melody with a secular one (cf Victimae paschali/D'ung aultre amer). Of the remaining Credos attributed to Josquin in Petrucci's Fragmenta missarum, and accepted in the modern complete editions of his works, the most questionable (on stylistic grounds) are Chascun me crie (De rouges nes) and La belle se siet; the former in particular seems to refer to a secular style fashionable in the 1490s, by which time Josquin was surely too sophisticated to have composed so clumsy a piece, and the latter is probably by Robert de Févin (to whom it is ascribed in Rvat C.S.41). The two Credos labelled 'Vilayge' (for the meaning of this term see Van den Borren, 1962), as well as the untitled Credo, though all quite different from one another, could certainly be early works by Josquin.

The Sanctus de Passione incorporates (as has been noted in §11(i)) the chordal 'Honor et benedictio' section that also forms part of the motet Qui velatus facie fuisti; no plainsong reference has yet been identified in the Sanctus itself, but further research might clarify liturgical connections between it and the motet. The Sanctus 'D'ung aultre amer' is also accompanied by a short homophonic motet, Tu lumen, tu splendor Patris, in this case placed after the second 'Osanna'. The text of this motet is the second verse of the Christmas hymn Christe redemptor omnium, but since the setting makes no reference to the hymn melody it is likely that no close liturgical connection with Christmas is implied; Sanctus and Benedictus themselves each combine the superius of Ockeghem's chanson with a version of the plainsong for ferial days in Advent and Lent, which suggests that this may be a setting for use in penitential seasons of the Church's year. The combination of D'ung aultre amer (principally the chanson's tenor this time) and the Lenten plainsong is also found in the Sanctus and Agnus Dei of Josquin's Missa 'D'ung aultre amer'; this work, in common with some by Gaffurius explicitly labelled 'missae breves', is built on an exceptionally small scale with rapid parlando declamation in the Gloria and Credo; it too may have been designed for ferial use in penitential seasons. Like the above-mentioned Sanctus settings, it contains an Elevation motet (the first half of Tu solus qui facis mirabilia), this time not merely attached to the Benedictus but replacing it altogether. The mass is compositionally more sophisticated and presumably later in date than the separate Sanctus settings, though because of its exceptional character it is particularly difficult to place in relation to Josquin's other complete settings of the Ordinary. It should be noted that none of the individual mass-sections found in the Fragmenta was republished until modern times. They represent a type of composition for the Ordinary of the Mass that was already out of date by the time Petrucci printed them, and it is not surprising if they show stylistic traits that belong to Josquin's earliest years.

(ii) Complete masses. A consideration of the sources again gives very little help to an attempt to trace the development of Josquin's complete mass settings in a roughly chronological order, and for the same reasons that have been stated in connection with the motets. The two complementary manuscript choirbooks now in Vienna (A-Wn Vind.11778 and 4809) may well, as Fallows (1999) suggests, contain all the masses that their scribe Pierre Alamire considered to be by Josquin, but their internal arrangement does not suggest any chronological ordering. Of the three Petrucci volumes which together contain all but one of Josquin's surviving masses, the first (1502) is the most homogeneous in style; the five works in it could all have been composed within the preceding 15 years (roughly speaking, Josquin's Roman period). The Liber secundus (1505) combines evidently recent works such as Ave maris stella and perhaps Hercules Dux Ferrarie with others (L'ami Baudichon and Une musque de Biscaye) which are clearly earlier than anything in the former volume. And when, after his removal to Fossombrone, Petrucci assembled yet a third collection of Josquin's masses, he was once again forced to include works from widely different periods: the Missa de Beata Virgine is, on both internal and external evidence (Glarean, again), a late work, but the Missa di dadi, if it is authentic, could only be an early one, and the remainder fall stylistically at various points in between (or, in the case of the Missa 'Mater Patris', to one side).

A categorization by genre is no more helpful. As has been noted, Josquin came on the scene at a time when the field for stylistic experiment was wide open. The strict cantus-firmus mass, drawing its musical unity primarily from a tenor part borrowed either from the Gregorian repertory or from that of secular song, was already beginning to show its limitations, while of the two techniques that were to become standardized in the 16th century – paraphrase of a plainsong melody, and so-called 'parody' (the transformation of a pre-existing polyphonic composition) – neither had yet become customary, let alone a matter of routine. Elements of all three types are mingled in many of Josquin's masses, and in various proportions. Sometimes Josquin restricted his borrowed material strictly to the tenor, in the old-fashioned manner (L'ami Baudichon, L'homme armé super voces musicales, Hercules Dux Ferrarie), sometimes the ostinato principle inherent in that technique was allowed to permeate the texture (Faisant regretz, Gaudeamus, La sol fa re mi); in other works he seems to be moving towards 'parody' of a complete composition (Fortuna desperata, Malheur me bat), while in two (Ad fugam, Sine nomine) and in the last three sections of De Beata Virgine he elevated strict canon to the governing principle for an entire work. (In De Beata Virgine, too, the technique of paraphrasing the appropriate plainsong, with which Josquin often played more or less consistently in his settings of the Credo, is employed throughout a mass.) But none of these groups can be assigned at all convincingly to a single period of Josquin's career. In general his instinct, at least in his mature works, seems to be to extract as much variety as possible from his given musical material, sacred or secular, by any appropriate means.

The relative poverty or wealth of resources that Josquin brought to his musical datum (of whatever kind) is therefore one of the criteria that have to be used in assessing the dates of his masses. Others are the extent to which that datum permeates the whole texture (a factor related to, but not identical with, the extent of imitative writing); the closeness or otherwise of the relationship between text and music, on both declamatory and expressive levels; the extent of agreement with the formal divisions that had become customary by the time of Josquin's death (separate sections for the 'Qui tollis' in the Gloria, the 'Et incarnatus', or 'Crucifixus', and 'Et in Spiritum Sanctum' in the Credo); and the extent to which he sought or achieved a satisfactory musical climax in the final section or sections of the Agnus Dei – though it should be borne in mind that these were particularly vulnerable to liturgically motivated pruning, to judge by the surviving sources.

(a) The early masses. None of the foregoing criteria alone is sufficient to justify identification of a particular mass as early or late; they must be balanced against one another, and that is inevitably a subjective matter which can produce disagreement, as can be seen by comparing even the most recent comprehensive accounts, those of Osthoff (1962–5), Sparks (1963) and Fallows (1999), let alone that of Ambros (1887–1911). Recent scholars are, however, in entire agreement in placing L'ami Baudichon as one of the very earliest of Josquin's surviving masses. It is a cantus-firmus mass, based on an exceedingly simple dance formula (very like the first two phrases of Three Blind Mice) with a ribald text; this is not quoted in any other voice than the tenor, except perhaps in inversion at the beginning of the 'Crucifixus'. As Sparks pointed out, the use of a virtually unchanging head-motif, the simplicity of melody and rhythm, and the clarity of texture and harmony are strongly reminiscent of the later Du Fay and must be taken as 'proof of a direct influence of the Burgundian style of the 1450s and 1460s'. It has been noted above (see §11(i) above) that among Josquin's early motets simplicity and clarity seem to be found side by side with a certain clumsiness, and it is only in the light of this that the Missa 'Une musque de Biscaye' can be accepted as being by Josquin at all, although the only known manuscript sources ascribe it unambiguously to him, and Petrucci included it in his Liber secundus. The basic tune (another secular melody, with a strongly marked popular character and a tonally anomalous ending) appears, or at least is referred to, in all voices, particularly superius and tenor, but with a lack of clarity and consistency that is quite uncharacteristic. Any attempt to regard this as mature richness of invention is contradicted by crudities of part-writing and dissonance treatment that are more frequent here than in any of Josquin's other masses. If this mass is by him, it must be early; and if it is early it reveals a quite different aspect of his character from L'ami Baudichon. In an attempt to reconcile the discrepancy of style between the two, it has been suggested that L'ami Baudichon's claim to authenticity is weaker than that of Une musque. It is true that it is disputed, in the sense that a copy of its Credo in the Speciálník Codex (CZ-HKm II A 7) is attributed to Tinctoris; however, the work bears little resemblance to any of Tinctoris's known masses. Une musque, on the other hand, though its earliest manuscript source dates from the 1490s, might easily have become misattributed to Josquin through a confusion with his canonic setting of the song. The absence of any independent music at all for its Agnus Dei (at least in the surviving sources, where it is directed to be sung to that of the Kyrie) in any case suggests a very early date, since Josquin soon learnt to invest the final section of the mass with a musically climactic character. This is apparent even in a work like the Missa di dadi, so called from the peculiarity that the proportions by which the tenor's notation is to be augmented in each section are indicated by dice faces, at least in the only known source, Petrucci's Liber tertius. The work is clearly early, to judge by its relative lack of imitation and general simplicity of style, but in the final Agnus the cantus-firmus (the tenor of Morton's chanson N'aray-je jamais mieulx) is for the first time taken out of the tenor and stated, a 4th lower, in the bass; for the first time, moreover, it is allowed to penetrate the rest of the contrapuntal fabric, a feature for which Long (1989) has proposed an ingenious but plausible symbolic explanation.

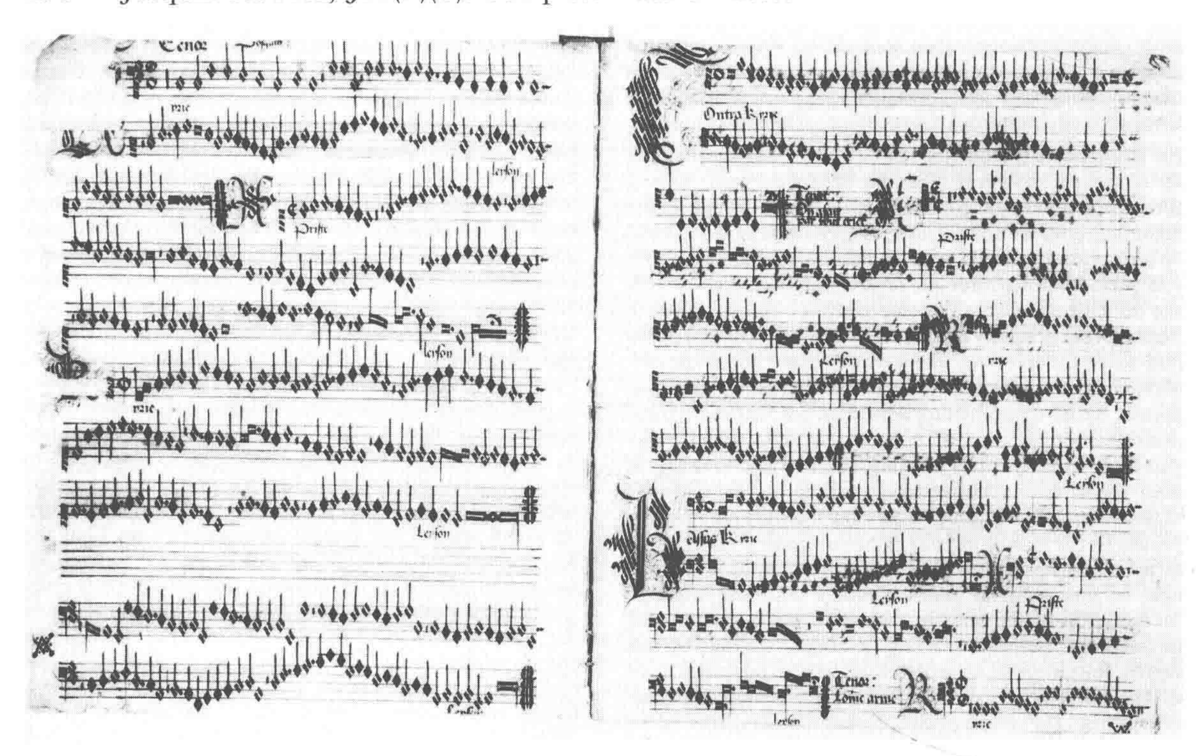
Different features of the Missa di dadi are taken up and explored separately in two more masses which can hardly be very much later. In Faisant regretz, along with quotation of the Ordinary chants, the ostinato use of a single four-note catch-phrase (taken from the second half of a rondeau by Walter Frye) forms the guiding principle of the whole work. In the final Agnus Dei it is combined with the entire Superius voice of the rondeau's first part to clinch whatever significance Josquin wished to convey by his quotation of this particular chanson: one begins to sense the power of an imagination that thrives on self-imposed limitations. In Fortuna desperata, on the other hand, Josquin made altogether freer use of the widely diffused Italian song that served as his model; all three of its voices are used separately as cantus firmi in different sections of the mass, but the relative looseness of musical connection that this engenders is to some extent compensated by brief quotations from the original three-part complex – perhaps the first instances of the parody principle in Josquin's music. (In the first of the two sections of the Agnus Dei, the original superius is transposed down, augmented and inverted, to form the bass of Josquin's counterpoint, and Lowinsky (1943) saw in this a symbolic representation of a catastrophic turn of Fortune's wheel; by the same token the return of the model's tenor, an octave lower but uninverted, as the bass of the final Agnus Dei may perhaps suggest a re-establishment of normality.) In Mater Patris Josquin (if he is indeed the composer) made a point of borrowing at least two voices at a time from the three-part motet by Brumel on which the mass is based; the Agnus Dei consists of the entire score of Brumel's motet, with two new voices added to it – a technique for which there are analogues in Josquin's secular music, but which it is surprising to find him using so literal-mindedly in the climactic section of a mass. The rather stiff alternation of contrapuntal two-part and chordal four-part texture elsewhere in the work can be seen, perhaps, as a deliberate exploitation of a feature of the motet, but the structure of the chords themselves – the upper voices often moving in parallel 6-4s with a free bass beneath – is found nowhere else in Josquin's music; although the strictly canonic duos that form the 'Pleni sunt coeli', Benedictus and Agnus Dei point towards his later practice, they seem short of his usual rhythmic élan. Mater Patris is an exceptional work – exceptional enough to make Josquin's authorship questionable, but also enough to make it very difficult to suggest anyone else as its composer. Elders, in his critical commentary for the NJE edition, argues strongly for its authenticity, and even suggests that it may have been designed as a memorial tribute to Brumel, who probably died in 1512 or 1513.



Canonic writing, which is a regular resource of Josquin's mature counterpoint, in both melodic and structural contexts, has been met with only sporadically in the masses so far discussed; further examples are the Benedictus of the Missa di dadi (where strictness is abandoned three-quarters of the way through) and the 'Osanna' of Faisant regretz (the tenor and bass of a four-part texture). In two masses, however, Josquin used it as his main principle of construction in almost every section. Of these the earlier is certainly the Missa ad fugam, unified not only by its canonic procedures but by a head-motif of no fewer than ten bars, repeated literally at the beginning of every section (Osthoff suggested that the different versions of Sanctus and Agnus Dei in D-Ju 31, where the head-motif is considerably abbreviated, may represent Josquin's own second thoughts about this). In this mass, superius and tenor are in canon throughout all sections except the Benedictus (all but the 'Pleni' and 'Qui venit' in the D-Ju version); the alto quite often joins in the imitative game, but the bass remains aloof. In the Missa sine nomine, on the other hand, not only are the canons themselves distributed through all voices in turn; all voices including the bass share in the imitative texture. This mass, indeed, comes close in style to those works of Josquin's latest period, when technical mastery is simultaneously deployed and concealed and is subordinated to the claims of clarity and expression.

(b) The mature masses. Before that final stage of his development, however, Josquin seems to have passed through a period of confident maturity in which every resource, both of compositional technique and of vocal virtuosity, is deployed with something like bravura. To this period belong some six or seven masterpieces which are difficult to set in any completely convincing chronological order precisely because they explore different paths and solve different problems with nearly equal accomplishment. Yet distinctions can be made. Of the two masses based on plainsong melodies, for instance, Gaudeamus is surely earlier than Ave maris stella. Gaudeamus combines cantus-firmus techniques and those of ostinato with vigour and inventiveness, working to a magnificent climax in the final Agnus, where the memorable opening phrase of the introit melody is put through a vertiginous series of transpositions. Yet the sheer musical inventiveness of this work at times conflicts with the effective presentation of the text; in Ave maris stella the musical phraseology is more carefully matched to that of the words. Imitation is frequent in both works, but the texture of Ave maris stella is even more fully permeated by motifs drawn from the cantus firmus. Its use of canon also seems more structural: where Gaudeamus contains only a single extended canon (the second Agnus), Ave maris stella uses canon in all three of the Agnus sections. Comparing the two masses as a whole, one senses that in Ave maris stella the exuberance of Gaudeamus has begun to be tamed, even spiritualized. (But Elders, 1985, has interpreted these differences in an opposite sense, arguing a later date for Gaudeamus.)

The Janus-faced quality of Josquin's genius (and the difficulties this poses for historians) is well illustrated by the Missa 'Malheur me bat'. Like Fortuna desperata it is based on a chanson (by Martini or more probably Malcort) and again makes very literal use of all three voice parts, separately and occasionally together, in an idiosyncratic linking of cantus firmus and incipient parody techniques. But various features indicate a later date for Malheur me bat: the calculated fantasy with which the Gloria's cantus firmus is laid out (two complete statements, but fragmented and shuffled), the considerable amount of imitative and strictly canonic writing, and above all the concluding six-part Agnus. Here the original chanson's superius and tenor are sumptuously reclothed in a new texture woven from two close canons, a procedure which at once links this work with the probably later L'homme armé sexti toni and Hercules Dux Ferrarie masses. The second of these also illustrates the dangers of attempting to date Josquin's mature masses by a single criterion rather than by balancing several. It was composed as a tribute to Josquin's patron Ercole d'Este, and its cantus firmus is derived from a solmization of the title (re, ut, re, ut, re, fa, mi, re = D, C, D, C, D, F, E, D), a phrase as unpromising musically as it was complimentary to the duke. This may be one reason why Josquin conspicuously confined it to the cantus-firmus voice (usually the tenor, occasionally the superius), weaving around it a texture that is imitative within itself but melodically quite unrelated. If homogeneity of all four voices were the only criterion of Josquin's mature style one would have to place this mass among his earliest, but the declamation and imitation in the non-cantus firmus voices suggest that it belongs somewhere between Gaudeamus and Ave maris stella, and probably nearer the latter. The extensive use of canon also suggests a relatively late date: between alto and bass at the 5th in the 'Pleni'; between superius, alto and bass in the second Agnus; and, in the last, a quasi-canonic antiphony between the upper three voices and the lower three of a texture specially expanded to six, which at once recalls such six-part motets as Ave nobilissima and Praeter rerum seriem. The systematic transposition of the cantus firmus to the 5th and octave above, and the proportionally controlled speed of its statements, also relate this mass to the later motets.

Josquin's two masses on the famous L'homme armé tune are both mature works yet extraordinarily contrasted in style. Of the two, that described as super voces musicales is certainly the earlier, for all its ingenuity. The title indicates that the melody is presented starting in turn on every note of the natural hexachord – on C in the Kyrie, D in the Gloria and up to A in the last Agnus Dei; since the music is in the D mode throughout, this gives rise to some piquant shifts of tonal centre and changes in the interval structure of the melody. The element of compositional virtuosity is at once apparent in the Kyrie (fig.3), which presents the three sections of the cantus firmus successively in mensuration canon between the tenor and each of the other voices in turn, but it also enters into those sections of the work from which the cantus firmus is absent: the Benedictus is a sequence of three mensuration canons, each for two equal voices, while the second Agnus is a mensuration canon for three. As with Gaudeamus, the work dazzles as much by its intellectual energy as by its eloquence. It is possible that the various processes through which Josquin put his melody in the course of it may have suggested certain features which are exploited in his other L'homme armé mass. This is described as 'sexti toni' (in the 6th mode) because the melody appears here with F as its final instead of the more usual G; this in practice gives it the major character that it has in Morton's chanson setting and in Ockeghem's mass, as against the minor character favoured by most other composers (including Du Fay, Busnoys, Tinctoris and Brumel). Apart from this transposition, the other features that may have been borrowed from the mass super voces musicales is that of retrograde statement of the theme: instead of presenting the two versions, direct and retrograde, successively, as he did in the Gloria and Credo of super voces, in the final Agnus Dei of sexti toni Josquin presented both versions in long notes simultaneously and then bedecked this severely intellectual scaffolding with two more close canons at the unison – a tour de force of musical skill that has few equals in the music of the period. Yet the hallmark of L'homme armé sexti toni is not strictness but freedom and variety. The melody appears in various speeds and rhythms in all voices, now complete, now with a single section repeated in ostinato or canon. And yet for all this wealth of contrapuntal fantasy, the expressive relationship with the words is never forgotten. Josquin's ability to spin much out of little is even more strikingly shown in La sol fa re mi, whose basic material is no more than a solmization pun. Virtually the whole mass is derived from this single five-note phrase; even allowing for shifts between hexachords in interpreting the solmization syllables, it is a breathtaking feat of sheer inventiveness. Technically it is both a return to, and an extension of, the style of Faisant regretz: once again ostinato is much in evidence (inevitably), but the subtlety with which the basic figure is varied and the ease with which it permeates the entire texture show an enormous advance on the earlier work.

(c) The last masses. The half-dozen or more masses of Josquin's high maturity already discussed would be enough to establish his reputation in this genre as the supreme exponent of both the main trends of his time: free fantasy and rational organization. But in his old age he continued to develop. The exuberance, as has already been suggested, falls away – or at least is subsumed into a style that aims rather at inward communication of the essence of the sacred texts than at their outward adornment and expression. Together with this it is perhaps possible to detect a certain turning back to earlier preoccupations, a desire to rework old problems with new insight. It has been shown above how in the Missa sine nomine Josquin reinterpreted the canon mass derived from Ockeghem (which he had once explored in the Missa ad fugam), investing it with a new sweetness and expressivity. In the Missa de Beata Virgine he looked even further back, jettisoning much of the elaborate panoply of motivic unity deployed in the virtuoso middle-period masses in favour of a unity based solely on the appropriate Ordinary chants for feasts of the Virgin. Thematic and even tonal unity are sacrificed to liturgical propriety; the fact that from the Credo onwards the four-part texture is expanded to five by means of canon suggests that the work was not even conceived as a complete musical unity. As in the early mass sections, paraphrased plainsong is the main constructional principle, but it is handled now with a serene mastery that fully explains why this work became (to judge by the number of sources in which it survives) the most popular of all Josquin's masses during the 16th century.

Whether or not the Missa 'Pange lingua' was composed by 1514, it was evidently not available to Petrucci for his third collection of Josquin's masses, published in that year. Though quite widely circulated in manuscripts, and indeed placed by Alamire at the head of one of his two collections of Josquin's masses now in Vienna (A-Wn Vind.4809), it was not printed until 1539, in Ott's Missae tredecim. But although one of the masses attributed to Josquin in this publication is by Pierre de La Rue and another (as Sparks, 1972, convincingly demonstrated) by Noel Bauldeweyn, there can be no doubt about the authenticity of Pange lingua. The plainsong hymn melody impregnates every voice and every section of the mass, but except for the final Agnus Dei, where it at last emerges into the superius, it is not given the old-fashioned conspicuousness of a cantus firmus, but rather digested into the counterpoint, which itself has a new austerity and economy. The vigour of the earlier masses can still be felt in the rhythms and the strong drive to cadences, perhaps more so than in the Missa de Beata Virgine, but essentially the two contrasting strains of Josquin's music – fantasy and intellectual control – are so blended and balanced in these two works that one can see in them the beginnings of a new style: one which reconciles the conflicting aims of the great 15th-century composers in a new synthesis that was in essence to remain valid for the whole of the 16th century.

It is the Corpus Christi version of Fortunatus's Easter hymn that Josquin had in mind in Pange lingua, as is shown both by the underlay of the final Agnus Dei in certain sources and by the mass's title (e.g. in A-Wn Vind.4809 and D-Ju 21): 'Missa de venerabili sacramento'. The two chief inspirations of Josquin's sacred music, to judge by the frequency with which they recur and the nature of the musical response they elicited from him, are the parallel ones of the virgin birth (more particularly its annunciation) and its re-enactment in the sacrament of the Mass. In this, of course, his piety was entirely typical of his time, but he transcended it in the intensity with which he expressed it. 'Le génie consiste ... à concevoir son objet plus vivement et plus complètement que personne', observed Vauvenargues. It seems appropriate that in these two late masses Josquin should have given such profound expression to the twin concepts at the heart of his religious belief.

13. SECULAR WORKS. The difficulties that impede a clear picture of Josquin's development as a composer of masses and motets are if possible increased when we turn to his secular music, since the sources are fewer, more scattered and less reliable. Petrucci included some 20 three- and four-part pieces in his earliest collections of secular music, but in several cases the attribution to Josquin is questionable on grounds of style or the evidence of other sources, and in a few Petrucci himself withdrew it in subsequent printings. His first and third books of frottolas, first published in 1504 and 1505 respectively, contain one piece each attributed to 'Josquin d'Ascanio'; these two and the lively Scaramella seem to be Josquin's only surviving settings of Italian texts. Individual as are these pieces and the two motet-like extracts from Virgil's Aeneid (perhaps composed for an Italian court), they hardly alter the fact that Josquin's main concern in secular composition was the chanson. Two double canons were included, anonymously, in Antico's collection of that specialized genre of chanson (RISM 1520[3]), and a further, very valuable, group of six three-part pieces in the same publisher's La couronne et fleur des chansons à troys (1536[1]). A miscellaneous anthology published at Augsburg (1540[7]) was the first to make available a few of the five- and six-part chansons, but it was not until the appearance in 1545 of Susato's Septiesme livre (a memorial volume devoted entirely to Josquin, together with elegies on his death) that the bulk of these, some two dozen, were given the wider circulation of print. Susato's volume was reprinted four years later by his Parisian competitor Attaingnant, with the omission of the memorial tributes by other hands and the addition of a few more pieces of dubious authenticity. This admittedly implies some degree of public response, but the fact remains that these two publications, together with a rather earlier set of manuscript partbooks written in Flanders (A-Wn Mus.18746), are almost the only sources to transmit what seems, in retrospect, to have been the greatest of Josquin's achievements as a composer of chansons – a body of works that brings into this genre the pathos and constructive power, albeit on a smaller scale, that inform his later motets.

They provide a fairly clear idea of the last stage of Josquin's career as a chanson composer. Its beginnings, however, can only be deduced from the works printed by Petrucci and scattered, often anonymously, through various manuscripts, mostly Italian. The chronology of these works is still very much a matter of conjecture, but allowing for the possibility of false attributions it does seem safe to say that Josquin began life as a chanson composer in the style developed during the 15th century at the French and Burgundian courts and carried to its final flowering by Busnoys and Ockeghem – a style in which directness of declamation and rhythmic repetition are deliberately suppressed in favour of a linear elegance matching the studied artificiality of the verse. This music further matches the poetry in its careful observance of the formes fixes, the system of smaller and larger repetitions which together go to make up the total shape of both poem and composition. In what are presumably Josquin's earliest surviving chansons these formalities are still observed: in Cela sans plus, for instance, the cadence that brings the music to a temporary halt at bar 33 clearly suggests the rondeau form, even though the music may have been conceived for instrumental performance. What is already different from Ockeghem, however, is the emphasis on strict imitation (the two upper voices are in canon for the first 25 bars) and on rhythmic and melodic repetition; the fivefold rising sequence in the second half of the piece is as typical of the younger composer as it is untypical of the older. In La plus des plus, also printed in Petrucci's Odhecaton, continued movement in the bass prevents the median cadence from functioning as in a rondeau, nor does the only known poem with this incipit fit the music at all comfortably. The music seems, in any case, to have been composed almost autonomously and gives the impression that Josquin was here primarily concerned with the working out of purely musical problems: for instance, it explores the possibilities of imitation at three pitches a 5th and a 9th (instead of the usual octave) apart – a technical problem also handled in Fortuna d'un gran tempo (for a discussion of which see Lowinsky, 1943).

The question arises as to how many of these early pieces were conceived to be sung at all and how many were from the start instrumental. Certainly Petrucci and most of the manuscript sources omit the words, so that the practice of purely instrumental performance must have been widespread. This is probably the origin of even more unambiguously instrumental pieces such as La Bernardina and Ile fantazies de Joskin (as it is called in its only source, I-Rc 2856), where there seems to be no reference to any text or borrowed vocal material at all. These pieces give the impression of being completely free-composed and as such represent the earliest steps towards the specifically instrumental contrapuntal style that was to be explored by Willaert and his contemporaries in the next generation.

But as a general rule Josquin preferred to base a composition, whether or not voices were intended to take part in its performance, on pre-existing material, and for this purpose he drew on the 'popular' music of his time – not necessarily folksong in the accepted sense, but music in the popular consciousness – a rich but labyrinthine repertory which partly survives in monophonic chansonniers (notably F-Pn fr.9346 and 12744) and was thoroughly explored in H.M. Brown: Music in the French Secular Theater, 1400–1550 (Cambridge, MA, 1963). Josquin's practice in arranging such tunes naturally varies. One of the simplest examples is Bergerette savoyenne (or savoisienne); here an elaborated version of the pre-existing tune is given to the top voice, each line being anticipated in the lower, accompanying voices. In Je sey bien dire (from Canti C) a tune with a strongly marked dance character is put in the tenor, while a web of partly imitative counterpoint is spun above and below it. L'homme armé, a rather primitive four-part notational puzzle which seems, however, unlikely to be authentic, also has its borrowed melody in the tenor.

Even in these relatively straightforward pieces there is a certain piquancy in the contrast between the simplicity of the basic material and the artfulness with which it is treated, but this is further heightened in the arrangements in which Josquin makes use of his favourite device of canon. In some, the type of strict imitation between the upper voices that we have already met in three-part pieces is transferred to the upper pair of four, as in the setting of Une musque de Biscaye, in which an elaborated version of the tune is presented in close canon at the 4th between the two upper voices. Even more ingenious are the four-part pieces which consist of two simultaneous canons: En l'ombre d'ung buissonet au matinet, Baisez moy (spoilt in the possibly unauthentic six-part version by the addition of yet another canon) and Se congié prens [Recordans de my segnora] – if this latter, with its clumsy patch at bars 22–3, is really by Josquin. (The four-voice Salve regina, though it is on a larger scale, also belongs with these works.) The canons in such pieces are too close to perform much more than a textural function; in others, though, Josquin can perhaps be seen to be working his way towards the concept of canon as an architectural scaffolding, articulating the melodic and tonal structure of an entire piece, which is so marked a feature of his later motets and masses. In Adieu mes amours, for instance, the very well-known tune is presented in turn, quasi-canonically, by the two lower voices, while the upper ones proceed more freely. (In one source the top voice is given a rondeau cinquain to sing, but the music takes little account of the requirements of the forme fixe.) The four-part setting of Entree suis proceeds very similarly, but with more motivic integration of the free voices. The basic tune of this piece also appears with the German text In meinem Sinn and with cognate Flemish forms; no doubt this encouraged the dissemination of Josquin's arrangement. The same applies to Comment peult haver joye, in which the tune (also associated with the German text Wohlauf, Gesell, von hinnen) is presented in strict canon with great clarity; this piece was printed by Glarean as a motet (O Jesu fili David) – just one instance of the way in which Josquin's music was annexed for use in the German-speaking countries. The five-part arrangement of the bass-danse melody La Spagna would be another, but the qualities of lucid structure and varied texture associated with Josquin (not to mention basic competence in the handling of dissonance) are so conspicuously absent from it that it is impossible to accept it as authentic on the shaky testimony of Ott, who published it as a motet (Propter peccata) in 1537.

The earliest stage in Josquin's development of the chanson for more than four voices is probably represented by his six-part setting of Se congié prens, another popular tune. Here the canonic voices clearly perform a structural function, with dux and comes ingeniously reversing roles during the central section, but the texture is by no means as integrated as in later works of this kind. This, in fact, is probably the earliest of the pieces included by Susato in his memorial volume of 1545, for they are on the whole conspicuous for the way in which the canonic voices (the great majority are constructed round a scaffolding of this kind) are blended into the surrounding texture. Se congié prens is not the only one to make use of a popular tune: Faulte d'argent (whose authenticity is questioned in Van Benthem, 1970), Petite camusette, Vous ne l'aurez pas and Tenez-moy en vos bras are further examples. Other chansons, most notably the famous setting of Jean Molinet's elegy on the death of Ockeghem, Nymphes des bois/Requiem aeternam, make use of a plainsong cantus firmus. Occasionally Josquin reworked a voice part from some earlier composition: Ma bouche rit borrows the superius of Ockeghem's chanson and gives it a new, rich, and surely instrumental setting – a more elaborate development of the treatment Josquin had already accorded to Hayne's De tous biens playne in a piece published in the Odhecaton. Several of the most individual, however, seem to be completely free-composed, such as the profoundly pathetic Regretz sans fin. In these pieces, too, it is noteworthy that although the old forme-fixe structure with its rigidly sectional cadence points had been completely abandoned in favour of through-composition, Josquin almost always took care to mirror the rhyme structure of the poem with musical repetition, either strict or varied: this applies particularly to the opening lines or couplets, as in Incessament livré, Plusieurs regretz, Je me complains and Douleur me bat. The old relationship to the structure of the text has been replaced by a new one, more in keeping with the denser texture and slower movement of a new musical style.

In his later chansons for a smaller number of voices Josquin generally eschewed canon: Plus nulz regretz and Mille regretz, both for four, are freely composed, though with the same clear articulation of lines and melodic points of imitation, achieved by a carefully balanced hierarchy of cadences. Nor did Josquin confine himself to a mood of sombre pathos, though it certainly seems to have been the one most congenial to him in his later years. Of the three-part pieces transmitted by Antico, Si j'avoys Marion, Si j'ay perdu mon amy and the two different pieces beginning En l'ombre d'ung buissonet all look forward in their elegant handling of light-hearted popular material to the 'Parisian' chanson of Janequin and his contemporaries. Quant je vous voy applies the same refined technique to more lyrical ideas (perhaps Josquin's own), while La belle se siet is an astonishingly original handling of an old ballad tune as the basis for what could almost be an instrumental fantasia if it were not for the patches of clearcut declamation; it is a unique and fascinating piece. In this collection Josquin rubs shoulders with a younger generation of French court composers, such as Févin. But there can be no doubt that the real influence of his later chanson style was felt farther north, above all by Willaert.

Jost, Ekkehard (b Breslau [now Wrocław], 22 Jan 1938). German musicologist and baritone saxophonist. While at the University of Hamburg, where he gained the PhD in 1966 with a dissertation on the acoustic and psychometric properties of the clarinet, he became involved with the emerging European free jazz movement and eventually performed with leading musicians such as the saxophonist Peter Brötzmann and the drummer Tony Oxley. As a research assistant at the Staatliches Institut für Musikforschung, Berlin (1966–72), he worked variously in acoustics, the psychology and sociology of music, and jazz. Since 1973 he has been professor of systematic musicology and head of the musicology department at the University of Giessen. He continues to perform avant-garde jazz, an activity that informs his musicological work.

Jost is the author of numerous articles and several books, of which the most significant is Free Jazz. Proceeding from the premise that free jazz is a freedom from thoughtless convention rather than an invitation to chaos, he analyses the music's overriding stylistic principles and differentiates between the approaches of its leading practitioners (who include John Coltrane, Ornette Coleman and Cecil Taylor). Jost's cohesive and penetrating stylistic survey has few parallels in jazz literature.

BARRY KERNFELD

Josten, Werner (Erich) (b Elberfeld, Wuppertal, 12 June 1885; d New York, 6 Feb 1963). American composer and conductor of German birth. After five years in commerce he turned to music, studying with Rudolf Siegel (harmony and counterpoint) in Munich and with Emile Jaques-Dalcroze in Geneva. He then lived in Paris (1912–14), returned to Munich at the outbreak of World War I, and in 1918 was appointed assistant conductor of the Munich Opera. In 1920 he visited the USA to tour as a composer-accompanist for song recitals, and he remained there as professor of counterpoint and composition at Smith College, Northampton, Massachusetts (1923–49), taking American citizenship in 1933. He was conductor of the Amherst and Smith College Orchestra and of the Northampton Opera Festival Orchestra, guest conductor of the Lewisohn Stadium Concerts, New York, and director of the Pioneer Valley Orchestra in Greenfield, Massachusetts (1947–50). While at Smith he conducted the first American productions of Monteverdi's Orfeo, Il combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda and L'incoronazione di Poppea, Handel's Apollo e Dafne, Giulio Cesare, Rodelinda and Serse and Fux's Costanza e fortezza. The honours he received included two Juilliard Music Foundation publication awards (1931, 1938).

Josten's music came to wide attention in 1929 with the first performances of the Ode for St Cecilia's Day (1925) and of Jungle (1928) (given by the Boston SO under Koussevitzky). During the next decade his works were played by leading orchestras; Stokowski concluded his opening concert of the 1932–3 season with Jungle, in defiance of the Philadelphia Orchestra's directors' wishes. The Violin Sonata (1936) was performed at the 1938 ISCM Festival, and in the same year the Composers' Forum Laboratory gave a concert of Josten's works in New York; a second followed at the New York World's Fair (1939). Josten's early orchestral pieces are harmonically expansive and often betray medieval, non-Western or modern French influences. After 1936 he concentrated on chamber works in concise Classical forms and with a mildly dissonant, sometimes bitonal harmony.

LESTER D. BROTHERS

Joteyko, Tadeusz (b Poczujki, nr Kiev, 1 April 1872; d Cieszyn, 20 Aug 1932). Polish composer, conductor, teacher and writer on music. He studied composition with Gaevert and the cello with Jacobs at the Brussels Conservatory; then at the Warsaw Conservatory he was a pupil of Noskowski (composition) and Cinke (cello). He began his career as a conductor, teacher and organizer in the regions of Lublin, Radom, Łódź and Kalisz. In 1914 he moved to Warsaw where he was conductor of the Warsaw PO (until 1918) and a teacher at the conservatory and other institutions, also continuing his activities in popularizing music through songbooks, school material, etc. Joteyko's works are deeply rooted in the Polish 19th-century tradition of Moniuszko and Żeleński. The music has a more modern stamp, however, with broader tonal relations and a pronounced use of chromaticism, yet also including Polish dance rhythms. His craftsmanlike choral works have retained their practical utility, although the operas – even Zygmunt August, which was very popular in pre-war Poland – have fallen from the repertory.

TERESA CHYLIŃSKA

Joubert, (Martin-)Célestin (b Saint-Savin-de-Blaye, Gironde, 23 July 1861; d Warsaw, 11 June 1934). French music publisher. He worked as a lawyer in Bordeaux and then in Paris, where he became the partner (1891) of his client Louis Bathlot, a music publisher (from 1868) and successor to Isidore Royol. In 1897 Joubert bought out Bathlot and moved to 25 rue d'Hauteville. He published many successful operettas and light works, including compositions by Rossini, Franck, Berlioz, Offenbach and Saint-Saëns.

The scope of his catalogue was greatly increased when he married Bathlot's daughter, the widow of Philippe Maquet. Maquet had acquired most of the Brandus brothers' catalogue (1887) which, in turn, included the catalogues of Maurice Schlesinger (acquired 1846) and Eugène-Théodore Troupenas (1850). Joubert was president of the Société des Auteurs, Compositeurs et Editeurs de Musique for most of the years between 1903 and 1932. The business was inherited by his son, Robert André (d Paris, 1 April 1969), whose widow retained an interest in the firm when Editions et Productions Théâtrales Chappell bought it in 1970.

ROBERT S. NICHOLS

Joubert, John (Pierre Herman) (b Cape Town, 20 March 1927). British composer of South African origin. He studied composition with Bell at the South African College of Music, Cape Town, and in London at the RAM (1946–56) with Holland and Ferguson. He was a lecturer in music at Hull University from 1950 to 1962, moving from there to the University of Birmingham, where he later held the post of reader in music (1969–86). In 1991 he received an honorary DMus from Durham University.

Joubert's reputation was quickly established after he won the Novello anthem competition in 1952 with O Lorde, the Maker of Al Thing, which like the carols Torches and There is no Rose, was soon added to the repertory of cathedral and other choirs. Joubert has since fulfilled many commissions for the Anglican church and his contribution to the British choral tradition has proved central to his achievement. In addition to smaller-scale sacred and secular settings (such as Rorate coeli and South of the Line, both 1985), Joubert has produced a number of choral works with orchestra: Urbs beata (1963) and The Raising of Lazarus (1970) are Handelian in form and dramatic in their use of musical imagery, whereas in the three choral symphonies (notably The Choir Invisible, 1967–8), symphonic coherence is assured by means of textural and thematic relationships.

Joubert's skill in writing to immediate requirements accounts for the number of commissons he has received. His Symphony no.1 of 1956 (written for the mainly amateur Hull Philharmonic Society) is built on simple material, but evinces total commitment. Commitment of a different kind is demonstrated by the Symphony no.2 (1971), commissioned by the Royal Philharmonic Society and dedicated to the victims of Sharpeville. His creative adaptability is also evident in the operas, from his initial essay in the genre, Antigone (radio op, 1954) to the powerful Under Western Eyes (1968), and three operas for young people including The Prisoner (1973). Each work nonetheless sounds with Joubert's authentic voice, a voice that has often reflected the influence of other British composers. Walton's example may be felt in Joubert's rhythmic style, though the influence blossoms in an independent way. From Britten, meanwhile, Joubert derived the grace of his lyrical style, and an ability to express new ideas using an instinctive, rather than calculated, juxtaposition of diatonic elements. This is exemplified in two later orchestral works, Déploration (1978), dedicated to Britten's memory, and the haunting Temps perdu (1984). The latter, together with the Sinfonietta (1962) and the song cycle The Instant Moment (1987), was issued on CD in 1997 by the British Music Society.

ERNEST BRADBURY/ANDREW BURN

Joule, Benjamin St John Baptist (b Salford, 8 Nov 1817; d Rothesay, 21 May 1895). English organist, compiler and editor. He studied the violin under Richard Cudmore and the organ, singing and theory under Joseph John Harris at Manchester. From 8 May 1846 to 20 March 1853 he was organist and choirmaster at Holy Trinity, Hulme, and from 28 April 1849 to 3 October 1852 he held a similar position at St Margaret's, Whalley Range, Manchester. On 27 March 1853 he became honorary organist of St Peter's, Manchester. At Holy Trinity Joule introduced the Anglican choral revival to Manchester and patronized the organ builder Frederick Jardine who, at Joule's expense, made a four-manual organ for Holy Trinity. This patronage was repeated at St Peter's, where the Jardine organ, designed and largely funded by Joule, was claimed to be the fourth largest in England. He was president of the Manchester Vocal Society, lectured on church music, contributed to various periodicals and was music critic to the Manchester Courier from 1850 to 1870. Joule is remembered for several widely used collections pertaining to the musical service of the English church.

Journet, Marcel (b Grasse, 25 July 1867; d Vittel, 25 Sept 1933). French bass. He reportedly studied singing in Paris and made his operatic début at Béziers in 1891 in La favorite. He sang at La Monnaie, 1894–1900, and then was based in Paris, appearing both at the Opéra and at the Opéra-Comique, where he sang in the French première of Puccini's La bohème (1898). He made his Covent Garden début in 1897 as the Duke of Mendoza in d'Erlanger's Inès Mendo. That season he sang the Landgrave in a French version of Tannhäuser; he returned regularly until 1907 and again in 1927 and 1928. He was engaged at the Metropolitan Opera, 1900–08, and then sang at the Opéra until 1931. He appeared frequently in other centres, including Monte Carlo, Buenos Aires, Chicago, Madrid and Barcelona, and was heard regularly at La Scala, 1917–27, where in 1924 he created Simon Magus in Boito's posthumous Nerone. Endowed with a powerful, resonant voice with a range which allowed him to sing such baritone parts as Tonio and Scarpia, he had a large repertory of French and Italian roles and many Wagnerian ones including Klingsor, Hans Sachs, Wotan, Titurel and Gurnemanz. His art is preserved on a number of recordings, most notably his Méphistophélès in Gounod's Faust.

HAROLD BARNES

Jouy, Etienne de [Victor-Joseph Etienne] (b Versailles, 19 Oct 1764; d Saint Germain-en-Laye, 4 Sept 1846). French librettist. The first 30 years of his life provided stories that he would embroider for the next 50. He joined the army at the age of 16 and spent time in French Guyana (1781–4) and India (1786–90) before the Revolution brought him home. After a brief foray into writing, he continued his army service for the Revolutionary forces and was rapidly promoted, but in 1793 was suspended and narrowly avoided capture and execution. He fled back to Paris before moving into exile in Switzerland where, despite his later glorification of the Swiss in Guillaume Tell, he found them the most inhospitable and egotistical people in the world. After the death of Robespierre (July 1794) he returned to Paris and briefly rejoined the army before turning decisively to a writing career. In the next five years he collaborated on eight vaudevilles, one of which (La prisonnière, 1799) used original music by Boieldieu and Cherubini, and another (Le tableau des Sabines, 1800) helped rescue the Opéra-Comique from bankruptcy. His first attempt at grand opera in La vestale (1807) was an enormous success, but Fernand Cortez (1809), his next work with Spontini, was less well received. Intended as propaganda for Napoleonic imperialism, its political message was perhaps not transparent enough, a problem he overcame in his final Spontini collaboration, a pièce de circonstance written to celebrate the restoration of the Bourbons in 1814: Pélage, ou Le roi et la paix. In reward for such ready royalism he gained entry into the Académie Française, but on Napoleon's return he quickly reverted to his previous allegiance, and was named Commissaire Impérial of the Opéra-Comique. After the second restoration of Louis XVIII (after the 100 days) he was understandably passed over and so became a stalwart of the liberals, editing a succession of opposition papers. Despite submitting a series of librettos to the Opéra in the 1820s (many of which are now lost), he had nothing more performed there until 1827, when his rewriting of Rossini's Mosé in Egitto (with Balocchi) was followed two years later by Guillaume Tell.

By the time of Tell Jouy was seen by the younger generation as a 'vieille perruque', one of the outdated classicists to be swept away in the Romantic revolution. In his plots, however, a traditional framework was transformed by exotic settings (Mexico in Fernand Cortez, India in Les bayadères), vast forces and melodramatic stage effects, in a way that grand opera would eagerly adopt in the 1830s. His Essai sur l'opéra français (Paris, 1826) shows a similar dichotomy between tradition and innovation, breaking up an elaboration of familiar 18th-century operatic aesthetics and defence of French tradition with a call for works based on national history, careful attention to historical costume and a more musical approach to verse-writing.

Jovernardi [Giovenardi, Giovernardi, Iovenardi, Jobernardi], Bartolomé [Bartolomeo] (b Rome, *c*1600; d Madrid, 22 July 1668). Italian harpist and theorist. After having studied mathematics, music and law at Rome, he decided in 1626 to seek his fortune at the Spanish court, but was prevented from emigrating until 1632, in which year he reached Barcelona. On 1 January 1633 he was appointed harpist in the Spanish royal chapel and on 11 November Philip IV issued an order to the Viceroy of Catalonia guaranteeing free entry of the instruments which Jovernardi had invented in Rome, including a cross-strung chromatic harp and a harpsichord of four octaves' compass (C to c‴), capable of crescendo and with provision in all but the bottom octave for both D♯ and E♭, G♯ and A♭.

Jovernardi succeeded Lope Machado as musician of the Cámara Real on 18 April 1642; his salary in that year amounted to 8050 reales of paper and 6815 of silver. During his long stay in Madrid, he often had difficulty collecting his salary, perhaps in part because of the envy of courtiers who resented his mixing in the affairs of state. In 1653 he sent Philip IV a summary of his services as political consultant since 1638, but even a royal order to pay him, issued late in 1654, went unheeded. He left for Italy early in 1655.

Jovernardi is known principally for his Tratado de la mussica (E-Mn 8931), whose dedication to Philip IV is dated 15 October 1634. The main subject of this bilingual treatise (Spanish and Italian on facing pages) is the classification and description of musical instruments, which Jovernardi divided into three categories: orgánica (blown), rítmica (struck) and participantes (stroked). He considered rítmica superior to the others and regarded his own specially constructed harp and harpsichord as the ideals of their kind. His 'cimbalo perfetto' was a single-manual instrument with three independent 8′ stops, which could be used in all seven combinations.

ROBERT STEVENSON

Joy, Geneviève (b Bernaville, 4 Oct 1919). French pianist. She studied the piano with Yves Nat and Lucette Descaves at the Paris Conservatoire, where she received a premier prix in 1941; she subsequently received premiers prix in harmony and in accompaniment. In 1945 she formed with Jacqueline Robin a piano duo that championed French music for more than 25 years. She was a professor of chamber music at the Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris (1962–6) and at the Paris Conservatoire (1966–86). She played the first performances of concertos of Rivier, Constant and Barraud, as well as the piano music of Henri Dutilleux, whom she married in 1946. Auric, Ohana, Mihalovici and Jolivet dedicated works to her, and she has made definitive recordings of Dutilleux's Piano Sonata, Milhaud's First Concerto for two pianos (with Ina Marika, conducted by the composer), and music for two pianos and piano duet by Chabrier, Bizet, Fauré, Debussy, Ravel, Poulenc, Françaix and Milhaud (with Jacqueline Robin).

CHARLES TIMBRELL

Joyce, Archibald (b London, 25 May 1873; d Sutton, Surrey, 22 March 1963). English composer and conductor. The son of a bandsman in the Grenadier Guards, he became involved with dance bands after experience in the theatre. By 1900 he had formed his own band, touring the country and performing in great houses and hotels for receptions and garden parties. For these Joyce composed 'medley' waltzes on contemporary popular tunes, and subsequently original compositions. He aimed at a smoother, dreamier type of dance than the Viennese waltz, which was still in vogue: many of the titles of his waltzes include the word 'dream'. Dreaming, which sold a milion copies in ten years, has been recorded some 40 times and became his most celebrated piece.

Other works have sentimental titles reflecting the gentle Edwardian style which he continued to exemplify until after World War II. His Caravan suite draws upon the colour of the East, whilst his 'waltz-militaire' Victorious celebrated the Allied victory of 1945. In addition Joyce wrote marches and used other dance forms, also contributing to two musical comedies. By the time of his death he represented a bygone age; he had displayed little sympathy with even the up-tempo dance music of the 1920s, but remains significant as the first English waltz composer to be published on the European mainland. Joyce's work is discussed in P.L. Scowcroft: British Light Music: a Personal Gallery of Twentieth-Century Composers (London, 1997).

PHILIP L. SCOWCROFT

Joyce, Eileen (b Zeehan, Tasmania, 1 Jan 1908; d Limpsfield, Surrey, 25 March 1991). Australian pianist. Her prodigious talent was recognized at an early age by Percy Grainger and Wilhelm Backhaus, and on the latter's instigation she went to study at the Leipzig Conservatory with Max Pauer and Robert Teichmüller. She later studied in London with Adelina de Lara and Tobias Matthay, and attended Schnabel's masterclasses. In 1930 she made her London début, giving the British première of Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto with Sir Henry Wood. Her playing was noted for its precision and clarity as well as its flamboyance, strength and stamina. She developed theories that associated colours with composers, which led to her habit of changing her concert dress during a performance to suit the atmosphere of the works she was playing. Her recordings include concertos by Ireland and Shostakovich and a number of short solo pieces. She retired from solo performance in 1960. Joyce was the subject of a children's book Prelude (1949) and a film Wherever she Goes (1951), both of which largely distort the facts of her colourful life.

CYRUS MEHER-HOMJI

Joyce, James (Augustine Aloysius) (b Dublin, 2 Feb 1882; d Zürich, 13 April 1941). Irish writer. 'Musical' was for Joyce perhaps the highest term of praise that could be accorded a piece of writing: he gave the title Chamber Music to his first book, and musical imagery recurs abundantly in his work thereafter. There are references above all to Irish popular song, the music of the Roman Catholic rite and opera; but the musicality of Joyce's prose, his attention to sound and rhythm, is ubiquitous, and in Finnegans Wake phonetic (and visual) considerations are as important as meaning and etymology in the construction of a language of polyglot pun and neologism. Some have seen this work as a composition based on musical principles and in particular on the leitmotif technique of Wagner. However that may be, the 'Sirens' episode of Ulysses seems to have been planned as a musical structure, stating its themes and then developing them.

Joyce appears to have had little interest in the composers of his time, with the exception of Antheil, whom he met through Pound. He suggested that Antheil compose an opera on Byron's Cain, but the project lapsed after Joyce had declined to tamper with the work of 'a great English poet'. Antheil was one of the 18 contributors of songs to The Joyce Book (London, 1933). Of these settings Joyce wrote to a third party that he liked Bliss's best, but in another letter he remarked that the volume was a mystery to him. He nevertheless wrote to Bax to praise his song for its singability, a quality he was well qualified to judge: as a young man he had appeared in public as a light tenor, and a career as a singer remained for some time a possibility.

Other composers to have set Joyce's poems include Barber, Berio, Casanova, Del Tredici, Goossens, Bill Hopkins, Salvador Ley, Moeran, Persichetti, Roussel, Serly and Szymanowski. After Joyce's death the phonetic and formal qualities of his prose also began to excite attention from composers, among them Berio again, Boulez (in his Piano Sonata no.3), Cage, Dallapiccola, Partch, Searle and Seiber.

PAUL GRIFFITHS

Joy Division. English rock group. Formed in 1978 by Ian Curtis (b Macclesfield, 15 July 1956; d 18 May 1980; vocals), Bernard Albrecht [Sumner] (Bernard Dicken; b Salford, 4 Jan 1956; electric guitar and vocals), Peter Hook (b Manchester, 13 Feb 1956; bass guitar) and Steven Morris (b Macclesfield, 28 Oct 1957; drums), they were a cult group with considerable potential. Their gloomy, dystopian style, together with remarkable stage performances from Curtis (an epileptic who danced in a series of seizure-like stops and starts), made them perhaps the leading indie band at the time of Curtis's suicide. Their final album Closer (Factory, 1980) and single Love will tear us apart (1980) were, for some, the finest releases of the year.

The band continued under the guise of New Order and recruited Gillian Gilbert (b Manchester, 27 Jan 1961; keyboards). During the 1980s their pioneering work opened up guitar-based indie styles to contemporary dance music, predating the indie and dance music crossover later in the decade. Blue Monday, originally released in 1983, spent a total of 51 weeks in the UK charts in various re-released and remixed forms during the 1980s and 90s. Only with their seminal single True Faith (1987) and the album Technique (Factory, 1989) did the band become a mainstream chart phenomenon. The secret to their deserved success was the quality of their unusual and intricate melodies, which were married with Sumner's recognizable and vulnerable vocal style and Hook's toppy, well-crafted bass lines. After Republic (London, 1993) their continued popularity was clearly shown by the success of their compilation, The Best of New Order (London, 1994), which reached number four in the UK charts. In the mid-1990s New Order stopped recording together. Sumner concentrated on his side project, Electronic, with Johnny Marr (formerly of the Smiths), Hook formed Monaco and Gilbert recorded with Morris as The Other Two. However, the band reformed in 1998 to perform live and new material has been planned. For further information see D. Curtis: Touching from a Distance: Ian Curtis and Joy Division (London, 1995).

DAVID BUCKLEY

Joye, Gilles (b 1424 or 1425; d Bruges, 31 Dec 1483). Franco-Flemish composer. He may be the 'Egidius Joye' who was presented to a chaplaincy at St Martin, Courtrai, in 1439, in which case his father could be the Oliver Joye resident there *c*1420 (StrohmM, 1985, p.257). He was a priest in the diocese of Tournai when installed as a canon of Cleves in 1453. From 1449 he was a singer at St Donatian, Bruges, where the documents report him frequently as having been involved in street-fighting, refusing to take part in polyphony when the chapter abolished the Feast of Fools, visiting brothels and lodging a concubine widely known as Rosabelle ('vocatam in vulgo Rosabelle'); he was nevertheless made a canon of St Donatian in 1459.

He sang as clerc at the Burgundian court chapel from September 1462, and from March 1464 as chappellain; he left after June 1468 but remained officially a member of the chapel until at least 1471, after which he seems to have returned to St Donatian, where he was buried. He also served as Rector of the Oude Kerk, Delft (documented 1465–73). Van Molle, in his comprehensive study, argued that Foppens (1731) was confused when he described Joye as a professor of theology and an excellent poet. The composer is named in Crétin's déploration for the death of Ockeghem (1497); a portrait of Joye thought to be by Memling is dated 1472 (see illustration).

His music shows a graceful blend of lyricism and clear declamation, often with repeated notes. The textless song was copied by 1456, and all the others by 1465, apart from the obscene Ce qu'on fait, which gives no hint of being in any later style; so all are likely to antedate his time at the Burgundian court. But they are very much in the Franco-Flemish manner of these years, with the single exception of Poy ché crudel Fortuna, which sets a text by the Florentine poet Rosello Roselli (1399–1452). There happens to be no documentary evidence of his presence in Bruges between 1454 and 1459, so he may have been in Italy. Strohm's view that the two three-part O rosa bella masses (ed. in G. Adler and O. Koller: Trienter Codices II, DTÖ, xxii, Jg.xi/1, nos.1–2) could be by Joye (a hypothesis fuelled by the name of his concubine), is hard to support objectively but by no means implausible from a stylistic viewpoint. The much later song J'ay bien nouri (ed. in Brown), ascribed to an otherwise unknown Johannes Joye in the Segovia choirbook (E-SE), is elsewhere convincingly ascribed to Johannes Japart, whose name could have been intended.

Joyeuse, Jean de (b Chémery-sur-Bar, Ardennes, 1635–40; d Narbonne, 15 Aug 1698). French organ builder. He was trained in Paris, but his organ-building career was largely in the south of France. Several of his contracts survive: these testify to his having introduced to the region such recent Parisian developments as a new type of bellows and the use of the Grosse Tierce in the chorus of 16′ organs. He also served as organist of St Nazaire, Carcassonne. Among his more notable instruments were those in St Nazaire, Béziers (1697), St Michel, Carcassonne (1664), and Auch Cathedral (1688).

BARBARA OWEN

Jozzi, Giuseppe (b ?Rome, *c*1710; d ?Amsterdam, *c*1770 or earlier). Italian singer, harpsichordist and composer. A castrato soprano, he regularly appeared on Roman stages from 1729 to 1740; some librettos describe him as 'virtuoso della duchessa di Gravina'. In 1730 he was listed as a member of the association of Roman musicians, the Congregazione di S Cecilia. Between 1740 and 1745 he sang in Venice, Milan and Bologna. In 1745 he came to London, where, as second soprano at the opera in the Haymarket, he was heard by Burney, who later described him as 'a good musician with little voice'. Jozzi brought over some harpsichord sonatas by Domenico Alberti, whose pupil he claimed to be, and, passing them off as his own compositions, performed them with great success. Burney wrote of a 'neatness and precision that were quite new in England at that time' and 'an accent, a spring and smartness in Jozzi's touch'. Jozzi had eight of Alberti's sonatas published under his own name, but the plagiarism was soon discovered and the sonatas were brought out by Walsh in 1748 under their real composer's name. Jozzi moved to Stuttgart, where he sang in the court opera between 1750 and 1756; an appearance in Venice in 1753 is also recorded. The Alberti sonatas were republished under Jozzi's name in Amsterdam in 1761 and 1765, but no convincing evidence has been cited in support of a commonly held belief that, having given up the stage, he finally settled in Amsterdam and practised as a teacher. Jozzi's own harpsichord sonatas are very close in general style to Alberti's, belonging to the most advanced current of mid-century Italian galant writing.

MICHAEL TALBOT/ENRICO CARERI

Juan I. See JOHN I.

Juana Inés de la Cruz, Sor [Cruz, Sor Juana Inés de la] (b San Miguel de Nepantla, nr Mexico City, 12 Nov 1648/51; d Nepantala, nr Mexico City, 17 April 1695). Mexican poet, dramatist and theorist. She was the daughter of a Basque captain, Pedro Manuel de Asbaje y Vargas, and Isabel Ramírez de Santillana. She demonstrated such intellect that at the age of eight she sought entrance to Mexico University, and after only 20 lessons mastered the Latin language. The 25th viceroy's wife, the Marchioness of Mancera, took her as a lady-in-waiting from 1664 to 1669. In 1667 she was for three months a novice in the austere Convent of the Discalced Carmelites, but found her true home in 1669 at the S Jerónimo Convent, Mexico City, where she spent the remaining 26 years of her life, gaining a transatlantic reputation as the 'tenth muse'. Her protectors included the Mexican Archbishop Payo Enríquez de Rivera and the wives of the viceroys who ruled Mexico during the periods 1680–86 (the Countess of Paredes) and 1688–96 (the Countess of Galve). Her literary works, reprinted several times in Spain until 1715, include three volumes of poetry (1689, 1692, 1700), 12 sets of villancicos published in Mexico City or Puebla and another ten sets that can be attributed to her. Her composers were Joseph de Agurto y Loaysa, Antonio de Salazar, Miguel Matheo de Dallo y Lana and Matheo Vallados, maestros de capilla at the cathedrals of Mexico City, Puebla and Oaxaca.

Calling herself a disciple of Cerone, Sor Juana annotated her copy of his El melopeo y maestro (now in the Congressional Library, Mexico City) and for the benefit of her musical sisters in religion she summarized portions of it in a treatise, El caracol (now lost), which she epitomized in a poem addressed to the Countess of Paredes. Her two plays, the second of which, Amor es más laberinto, was written in collaboration with another poet, and her three autos sacramentales abound in musical allusions and in sections that demand singing and/or instrumental music. In her last work, Respuesta a Sor Filotea de la Cruz, completed on 1 March 1691, she reminded the Bishop of Puebla that scripture cannot be properly interpreted without musical science, citing Genesis xviii.23–33 and suggesting that Abraham's numbers are to be understood as an inspired reference to musical intervals.

ROBERT STEVENSON

Juanas, Antonio [Juan Antonio] de (b ?Spain, *c*1755; d ?Spain, after 1818). Composer, probably of Spanish birth, active in Spain and Mexico. By 1780 he was maestro de capilla at Alcalá de Henares, and in that year he applied for a similar post at Avila Cathedral and also obtained references for a post at El Burgo de Osma. By the early 1790s he had moved to Mexico City, where he was maestro de capilla from at least 1793. The following year, according to Catalyne (Grove6), he was cited by the Inquisition for translating a subversive French song and favouring the ideals of the French Republic. He left Mexico for Spain on 18 February 1819.

Juanas was one of the most prolific composers of his time in the New World, and unusual in devoting himself almost entirely to Latin texts. His only examples of the vernacular villancico are De Teresa el corazón (1780, for the contest at Avila) and El clarín de la fama (1802, for a procession in Mexico City Cathedral). Juanas's music, much of which awaits careful study, is harmonically less daring than that of his predecessors Matheo Tollis de la Roca and Ignacio Jerusalem, and less flamboyant than theirs in figuration and vocal display. It progresses mostly in steady, unperturbed harmonic rhythms, and displays a competent craftsmanship.

Jubal. Biblical figure. In Genesis iv.21 he appears as a descendant of Cain and son of Lamech, 'who was the ancestor of all who handle lyre and pipe'. Jubal occupies a secondary but not altogether negligible position in Western musical thought. In medieval music treatises he finds place as one of the inventores musicae, along with Pythagoras; this is an interesting juxtaposition which pits biblical against classical authority. The earliest writers, such as Cassiodorus and Boethius, do not mention Jubal, but from Isidore onwards virtually all cite both Jubal and Pythagoras, and curiously enough most of them maintain a neutral position on the priority of the two inventores. ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, for example, wrote: 'Moses [the supposed author of Genesis] says that Jubal, who was of the root of Cain before the flood, was the inventor of the art of music. The Greeks on the other hand say Pythagoras discovered the first principles of this art from the sound of hammers and the plucking of taut strings'. Many of these authors, moreover, after manifesting an explicit neutrality, go on to display an implicit preference for Pythagoras. Jubal is given only perfunctory mention, while the theoretical implications of Pythagoras's discoveries are discussed at length. This preference is, of course, explained by the fact that these are writings about Musica, one of the four mathematical studies that make up the Quadrivium. In such a context Jubal appears almost as an Hebraic interloper among the Hellenes.

Yet some theorists were sufficiently troubled by the implied contradiction of biblical authority to deal with the question explicitly. The 9th-century AURELIAN OF RÉÔME appears initially to have been doing so when he wrote in his Musica disciplina: 'Among us the authority of scripture declares the first teacher of this art before the flood to be Jubal'. But he goes on to claim a sort of divine sanction for the achievement of Pythagoras as well: 'In my opinion our frequently discussed Pythagoras could not have discovered the various proportions without divine inspiration'. It was the late 13th-century scholastic EGIDIUS DE ZAMORA who finally spelt out a position that was logically coherent and consistent with Christian belief, even if somewhat contrived. He acknowledged that Pythagoras was a clever student of music who did, in fact, learn much from the sound of hammers issuing from a smithy, but he insisted that biblical authority established Jubal as the first to have done so. He pointed out that Jubal's half-brother Tubalcain, 'who forged various instruments of copper and iron' (Genesis iv.22), was the first blacksmith. 'And as Tubalcain worked', wrote Egidius, 'Jubal was delighted by the sound of the hammers and cleverly calculated from the weight of the hammers the proportions and consonances arising from them. The Greeks falsely attributed this discovery to Pythagoras.'

Concern over Jubal's status as a discoverer of music eventually disappeared from Western musical writings, largely as a result of the rationalistic atmosphere of the 18th century. It lingered longest in Germany, where an author such as Jakob Adlung, writing in his Anleitung zu der musikalischen Gelahrtheit (1758), could display a mixture of respect for divine authority in terms of the new rationalism: 'Where then does one read of Jubal that he discovered music? Nowhere. But only that from him descended the fiddlers and pipers. Are these then the only musicians? What then is vocal music? Has not this always been taken as more important than instrumental music?'. Adlung may have been the last figure in the mainstream of Western musical thought seriously to argue the merits of Jubal's position.

Jubilate. Psalm c (Hebrew numbering, Psalm xcix in the Vulgate), identified by the first word of the Latin text. In addition to substantial self-contained settings (Giovanni Gabrieli, Schütz, Mondonville), the psalm has had specific liturgical significance since the 16th century. The English Protestant reformers first included Jubilate as an alternative to the second canticle, Benedictus, at Morning Prayer (Matins) in the 1552 version of The Book of Common Prayer. Like the Benedicite (Daniel iii.57–88, 56, alternative to the first canticle, Te Deum), it was originally part of the psalmody at Lauds on Sunday in the Latin rite (secular cycle). The Prayer Book rubric specifies the Jubilate only when the Benedictus (Luke i.68–79) is read as a lesson or Gospel, but it has been used more widely. English composers have paired it with either the Benedicite (Purcell in B♭) or Te Deum, including occasional settings by Purcell for St Cecilia's Day, 1694, and by Handel for the celebration of the Peace of Utrecht, 1713. In The Alternative Service Book 1980 and some other revised forms of Morning Prayer it is an alternative to the Venite (Psalm xcv [xciv]) as the invitatory psalm.

Jubilee Singers, (Fisk). American choral group. It was organized in October 1871 as the Fisk Singers to make fund-raising tours for the newly established college for freed slaves, Fisk University at Nashville, Tennessee, which opened barely six months after the end of the American Civil War; George L. White (1838–95), the school's music teacher, chose nine singers and a pianist from his well-trained student choirs of former slaves. Following a concert at Columbus, Ohio, White officially named them the Jubilee Singers after the Old Testament's 'year of jubilee', since all but two of them had been freed from slavery. Henry Ward Beecher, the minister of Plymouth Congregational Church in Brooklyn and a supporter of abolition, endorsed the group, and used his influence to arrange engagements for them throughout the eastern USA. Their programmes consisted mostly of four-part arrangements of spirituals, which many of the students had known as slaves, as well as anthems, operatic selections and popular ballads. They returned to Fisk six months later with enough money to purchase the 25 acres of land on which the university is sited and to pay off the school's debts.

In June 1872 the singers were invited to appear at Patrick S. Gilmore's Second World Peace Jubilee in Boston, which brought them national recognition; a New England tour and an invitation to sing at the White House for President Ulysses S. Grant followed. As a reorganized group of four men and seven women, they toured the British Isles in 1873–4 under the patronage of the Earl of Shaftesbury, and the money raised on that tour made possible the construction of Jubilee Hall (dedicated January 1876), the university's first permanent building. A second European tour (1875–8) took in Scotland, the Netherlands, France, Sweden and Germany, The $150,000 raised by the group up to that time ensured the continuation and growth of the university. The singers made several appearances at the Chautauqua Assembly in New York and in 1884 began a six-year world tour.

The Jubilee Singers tradition has remained a permanent institution at Fisk University, and in 1979 the name 'Jubilee Singers' became a registered trademark of the university. Their fame has also led to the use by other groups of their name; the informal addition of 'Fisk' was made to distinguish them from their imitators. They established the black spiritual in the history of American music; the group was the first to introduce and popularize these songs among white audiences, and became a model for later black singing groups. Their spirituals were published in two contemporary editions, one compiled by Seward (with the help of Sheppard) as Jubilee Songs as Sung by the Jubilee Singers of Fisk University (1872), the other by Seward and White as Jubilee Songs (1884); in 1913 a recording of the group was issued by Victor under the title Fisk University Jubilee Quartet. Important documents concerning the singers are held in the Fisk University Library's special Jubilee Singers Archive.

Jubilus. Term describing an ancient wordless chant sung by labourers that in modern times came to be associated with the melismatic vocalization of the alleluia of the Mass (see ALLELUIA, §I). The nouns jubilus and jubilatio, and more often the verbal form jubilare, appear with some frequency in Latin literature, where they refer to a sort of wordless call or chant. Wiora has traced the Latin word jubilus to a common linguistic root, io, that has a peculiar acoustical force, and he associates the phenomenon of the Latin jubilus with similar cries heard in other cultures – the Alpine yodel, for example, and the call of the Volga boatmen. In Latin literature the jubilus could figure as a primitive whoop or shout, as when Apuleius speaks of a group of farm labourers who set their dogs upon intruders with 'the accustomed jubilations [iubilationibus solitis] and other kinds of shouts' (Metamorphoses, viii.17). A more lyric jubilus is suggested by Silius Italicus who writes of the Cyclops delighting in the jubilations (iubila) of the Siren (Punica, xiv.475). But probably the most common usage is that involving the song of farm workers, who, as they were harvesting, employed a repetitive rhythmic chant presumably to facilitate their labour; Fronto, the tutor of Marcus Aurelius, describes how 'we gave ourselves to the task of grape-gathering, we sweated and we jubilated [iubilavimus]' (Ad M.Caes. iv.6). The 2nd-century grammarian Festus summarized matters in his definition of jubilare: 'to jubilate is to cry out with rustic voice'.

The term entered Christian literature by way of the Psalm Commentary, a common genre of patristic exegesis in which the author works his way through the entire Book of Psalms, spinning figurative tropes upon virtually every important word of the text. The Church Fathers searched far and wide through sacred and secular learning and lore for their material, and it is no surprise that they seized upon the jubilus when commenting on the word jubilare. Hilary of Poitiers (d 367), the author of the first Latin Psalm Commentary, begins his treatment of Psalm lxv.3, Jubilate Deo omnis terra, by saying: 'Now according to the convention of our language we give the name jubilus [iubilum] to the sound of a pastoral and rustic voice'. But as the following passage shows, it took the imagination of Augustine to exploit the implications of the wordlessness of the jubilus, which he saw as a symbol of a joy that surpasses the expressive capacity of ordinary speech: 'Mowers and vintagers and those who gather other products, happy in the abundance of harvest and gladdened by the very richness and fecundity of the earth, sing in joy'. Angustine continues by noting the textless chants of these workers: 'between the song which they express in words, they insert certain sounds without words'; and he concludes by exclaiming that a worker 'bursts forth in a certain voice of exultation without words . . . because filled with too much joy, he cannot explain in words what it is in which he delights' (In psalmum lxv).

Needless to say, Augustine saw spiritual implications in this kind of joy, but he never associated the jubilus with the textless melisma of a liturgical alleluia. He spoke of the jubilus numerous times in his Psalm Commentary but always in connection with the appearance of some form of the word jubilare in the biblical text. He never introduced the word 'alleluia' into any of these passages, nor, conversely, did he introduce the idea of the jubilus into his many extended discussions of the liturgical exclamation 'alleluia'. (Moneta Caglio made the same observation and concluded that the Augustinian jubilus referred not to the alleluia but to melismatic passages of the responsorial gradual psalm; the language of the Augustinian references, however, makes neither an explicit nor implicit connection between the jubilus and any form of liturgical singing.)

The association of the jubilus with melismatic liturgical chant appears for the first time in the works of the 9th-century scholar Amalarius of Metz (*d c*850). The eventual linking of the two was all but inevitable: the notion of jubilus as expressing a joy beyond speech was an exegetical commonplace in the Middle Ages, and clerics were in the presence of melismatic chant every day. But it should be noted that Amalarius associated the jubilus not just with the alleluia but with melismatic chant in general. This remains the case with ecclesiastical authors throughout the Middle Ages; Hugh of St Victor (d 1142), for example, wrote: 'Neumata, which take place in the alleluia and in other chants of few words, signify the jubilus, which happens when the mind is so fixed upon God . . . that it is not able to express fully what it feels' (De officiis ecclesiasticis, ii.19). It is chant scholars of modern times who have confined the definition of the jubilus to the melismatic extension of the alleluia of the Mass. This definition has greatly distorted the early history (or more properly, pre-history) of the alleluia in the centuries before the emergence of the mature Gregorian form. It remains nonetheless both proper and convenient to apply the term jubilus to the melismatic portion of the medieval chant. Discussions of the alleluia rightly dwell upon the fascinating musical characteristics of the hundreds of preserved alleluia jubili and the relationship of these melodies with those of the alleluia verses.

Juch, Emma (Antonia Joanna) (b Vienna, 4 July 1863; d New York, 6 March 1939). American soprano and impresario of Austrian birth. Born of naturalized American parents, she grew up in New York City, where she studied with her father and with Adeline Murio-Celli. Her concert début (1881) at Chickering Hall attracted the attention of Mapleson, who signed her for three seasons at Her Majesty's Theatre, London, where she made her operatic début, in June 1881 as Philine in Thomas's Mignon; she sang the same role in her American début with the Mapleson Company at the New York Academy of Music (October 1881). In 1884 she toured the USA with a troupe of Wagnerian artists under Theodore Thomas, and in 1886 became a principal (under Thomas) with the ill-fated American (later the National) Opera Company. In 1889 Juch formed her own opera troupe, which travelled and performed throughout North America for two years; its all-English repertory included French, Italian, German and English operas. Between 1891 and 1894 (when she retired from the stage) Juch appeared in numerous concerts, recitals and music festivals. She was a champion of opera in English, and her refined diction (in English, French, German and Italian) was considered a model. She had a voice of exceptional purity and wide compass, and was a skilled actress. She was recorded by the Victor Talking Machine Company (some of these recordings can be found in research libraries in the USA).

Judas Priest. English heavy metal band. Formed in 1971, their best-known line-up was K[enneth].K[eith]. Downing (b West Midlands, England 27 Oct 1951; guitar), Ian Hill (b West Midlands, England 20 Jan 1952; bass), Rob Halford (b Birmingham, England 25 Aug 1951; vocals), Glenn Tipton (b West Midlands, England 25 Oct 1948; guitar) and a series of drummers, most notably Dave Holland for most of the 1980s. Halford left the band in 1992, to be replaced by Tim 'the Ripper' Owens in 1996. It was one of the most influential and successful heavy metal bands of the 1970s and 80s. Its most distinctive asset was Halford, its lead singer for two decades, whose extraordinarily powerful voice (which occasionally reached as high as f'') perfectly suited the band's aggressive style. Halford performed in leather-and-chains S&M costumes, and millions of fans accepted this gay leather-bar style as the embodiment of straight hypermasculinity. Judas Priest's lyrics often present a view of the world as dangerous and oppressive, to which the best response is resistance and revenge; thus, album titles such as Screaming for Vengeance (CBS, 1982). Their music features precise ensemble work at fast tempos, sudden key changes for dramatic effect, intensely driving rhythms and power-chord-based riffs. They were one of the first metal bands to employ two lead guitarists, which enabled them to incorporate harmonized two-guitar passages into their songs.

ROBERT WALSER

Judd, James (b Hertford, 30 Oct 1949). English conductor. He studied the piano with Alfred Kitchin and conducting with Bernard Keefe at Trinity College of Music in London (1967–71), before training at the London Opera Centre and becoming assistant to Maazel in Cleveland (1973–5). His association with the European Community Youth Orchestra began in 1978, when he became associate music director, later to become artistic director (1990). He participated in the founding of the Chamber Orchestra of Europe in 1981, taking them on tour to the USA (1984–5), Europe and East Asia. Judd was music director for the Florida PO from 1988, and appeared with the ENO before becoming artistic director of Greater Miami Opera (now Florida Grand Opera, 1993–6). He has also appeared at Glyndebourne (La Cenerentola, 1995), with the Berlin PO, Prague SO, Orchestre National de France, Royal Stockholm PO and New Zealand SO, among others, and made his Salzburg Festival début in 1993. He regularly conducts the LPO and English Chamber Orchestra and in 1997 conducted the première of Nyman's Saxophone Concerto with the Philharmonia; he has recorded works by Meyerbeer, Donizetti, Mahler and Elgar with the RPO and the Hallé Orchestra.

JOSÉ BOWEN/CHARLES BARBER

Judd, Terence (b Hammersmith, London, 3 Oct 1957; d Beachy Head, nr Eastbourne, 23 Dec 1979). English pianist. He won first prize, aged ten, in the National Junior Piano Competition, London, in 1967 and first appeared at the Royal Albert Hall the following year. In 1969 he played Beethoven's First Concerto with the LPO at the Royal Festival Hall and in 1970 made his US début in Cincinnati. He performed in Caracas in 1972 before returning to the USA for solo and concerto engagements. Judd was a finalist in both the Busoni and Casagrande international competitions in 1975 and 1976 respectively, and in 1976, aged 18, he won first prize in the British Liszt Competition. In 1978 he was awarded a music fellowship by the Calouste Gulbenkian Foundation and in the same year was a finalist at the Tchaikovsky International Competition. He returned to Russia for many concerts, appeared with the Gabrieli String Quartet, and was due to tour Russia again with the Leningrad PO at the time of his tragic death. Recordings of his Moscow performances complement an earlier three-disc set, 'In Memory of Terence Judd'. All these testify to his scintillating potential and rare accomplishment, notably in his performances of Balakirev's Islamey and Samuel Barber's Sonata.

BRYCE MORRISON

Judenkünig, Hans (b Schwäbisch Gmünd, *c*1445–50; d Vienna, early March 1526). German lutenist, composer and probably lute maker. His family came from Württemberg; his father may have been one Hartmann Judenkünig. He is first recorded in 1518 as a lutenist in the Corpus Christi confraternity at the Stephansdom in Vienna; he had probably already been working as a musician there for some time, and he lived in the oldest quarter of Vienna in a house called the 'Gundlachhaus', later celebrated under the name of 'Köllnerhof' as a centre for musicians and merchants. Although he was not a member of the nobility, his prominent position as a citizen is indicated by a coat of arms depicting a string player, which appeared in both his books; both books also include a full-page woodcut showing a bearded lutenist (probably Judenkünig himself), together with a pupil playing a large viol. Judenkünig was in contact with the learned humanistic community of Vienna: he arranged some of the odes of Petrus Tritonius, and he seems also to have been familiar with the ideals of the poetic-mathematical circle around Conrad Celtis. His date of death at an advanced age was recorded in the margin of one copy of his Underweisung.

Along with Sebastian Virdung (Musica getutscht, 1511), Judenkünig was one of the first in the German-speaking region to publish a self-instruction manual for the lute. His Utilis et compendiaria introductio, qua ut fundamento iacto quam facillime musicum exercitium, instrumentorum et lutine, et quod vulgo Geygen nominant, addiscitur was printed in Vienna at his own expense, probably between 1515 and 1519 (for editions see BrownI). It opens with a concise set of instructions for playing the lute, followed by intabulations of 19 settings by Tritonius of the odes of Horace and a setting of Catullus' 'Vivamus, mea Lesbia'. Rules for tuning the lute are then followed by a group of intabulations including ten of lieder, the hymn 'Christ ist erstanden' and 'Der hoff dantz'. Ain schone kunstliche Underweisung in disem Büechlein, leychtlich zu begreyffen den rechten Grund zu lernen auff der Lautten und Geygen (Vienna, 1523; ed. in Die Tabulatur, x, 1969) consists of two parts. In the first, instructions for left-hand fingering on the lute alternate with practical exercises in a progressive series: there is an introductory group of two-voice intabulations based on the tenor and bassus parts of four lieder, followed by a Pavana alla veneziana taken from Dalza's Intabolatura de lauto (1508) and 'Ain hoff dantz mit zway stimen'; the first five left-hand positions are illustrated by three-voice intabulations of 11 lieder, an ode by Tritonius, a motet and a chanson, six dances (including another taken from Dalza), and five fantasias called 'Priamel'. Judenkünig also included instructions on right-hand fingering. The second part of the Underweisung has its own title page; it is a manual of mensural notation and intabulation technique. Although viols are mentioned in the titles of both books, they are virtually ignored in the texts.

Jug band. An instrumental ensemble developed among black Americans in the 1920s and 30s as a popular novelty entertainment for medicine shows and rural picnics. It takes its name from the use of a jug as a bass instrument, the player making buzzing sounds with the lips and the jug acting as a resonator. Generally only one jug is used in each band, which otherwise comprises strings and a melody instrument such as harmonica or kazoo; but one of the earliest such groups, Whistler's Jug Band from Louisville, sometimes used as many as three jugs. The Dixieland Jug Blowers (also from Louisville) occasionally employed two jugs and as many as three wind instruments. The jug is associated mainly with folk-blues groups; Will Shade's Memphis Jug Band and Gus Cannon's Jug Stompers, both based in Memphis, were pre-eminent among early jug bands. The former's K.C. Moan and the latter's Going to Germany (both 1929, Vic.), minor masterpieces of the genre, feature an interplay of harmonica or kazoo against strings and jug. The style of Jack Kelly's South Memphis Jug Band was more primitive, as is demonstrated by Highway no.61 Blues (1933, Mlt.). In rural districts the jug continued to be used as a folk instrument, though it lost its popularity on recordings late in the 1930s. During the folk revival of the 1960s jug bands were briefly reintroduced by white performers in the blues idiom.

Juguete (from Sp.: 'toy'). According to the first edition of the Diccionario de la lengua castellana (Madrid, 1726–39) a juguete is a joyful and festive song. In the late 17th century the Mexican poet Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz favoured it as a variant of the VILLANCICO. Few examples of the juguete survive with music, but one is included in the 1659 cycle of villancicos for Christmas Eve Matins by Juan Gutiérrez de Padilla, maestro de capilla at Puebla, Mexico.

E. THOMAS STANFORD

Juilliard, Augustus D. (b 19 April 1836; d New York, 25 April 1919). American music patron. The son of Huguenot refugees, he was born on board a ship bound for the USA. He became a salesman and eventually founded his own textile firm, A.D. Juilliard & Co., which became the leading house in the USA. Between 1892 and his death he was president of the Metropolitan Opera and Real Estate Company; he also served as director or manager of many large American banks.

In his will Juilliard provided for a Juilliard Musical Foundation with an endowment of some $12 million, at that time the largest gift to music that had been recorded; he stipulated that the fund be used to support the Metropolitan Opera, finance concerts and assist deserving students. The foundation's first secretary, Eugene Allen Noble (1868–1948), set up a conservatory in 1924, the Juilliard Graduate School; on its amalgamation with the Institute of Musical Art in 1946 its name was changed to the Juilliard School of Music.

Juilliard String Quartet. American string quartet, founded in 1946 by William Schuman, then president of the Juilliard School. The members are Joel Smirnoff (b New York, 1950), who studied at the University of Chicago and at Juilliard, and in 1980 became a member of the Boston SO; Ronald Copes (b Arkansas, 1950), who studied at Oberlin Conservatory and at the University of Michigan, taught at the University of California, Santa Barbara, and was a member of the Dunsmuir and the Los Angeles piano quartets as well as appearing as a soloist; Samuel Rhodes (b Long Beach, NY, 1941), who studied the viola with Sydney Beck and Walter Trampler and composition with Earl Kim and Sessions, later becoming a member of the Galimir Quartet (1961–9) and a professor at Juilliard; and Joel Krosnick (b New Haven, CT, 1941), who studied with William D'Amato, Luigi Silva, Jens Nygaard and Claus Adam, was a member of the New York Chamber Soloists and gave the premières of Ligeti's Cello Concerto and Gerhard Samuel's Three Hymns to Apollo. At its founding the quartet was lead by Robert Mann (b Portland, OR, 1920), who studied the violin with Edouard Déthier and composition at Juilliard, and who appeared frequently as a soloist; the original second violinist was Robert Koff, who was succeeded by Isidore Cohen (1958–66), Earl Carlyss (1966–86), Joel Smirnoff (1986–97) and Ronald Copes (from 1997); Rhodes replaced the original viola player, Raphael Hillyer, in 1969; the original cellist, Arthur Winograd, was succeeded by Claus Adam in 1955 and by Krosnick in 1974.

The Juilliard String Quartet has been quartet-in-residence at Juilliard, the Library of Congress (from 1962) and Michigan State University (from 1977). Although the quartet is usually identified as specializing in 20th-century music (its repertory of nearly 600 works includes over 150 by 20th-century composers), it has come to devote an equal amount of time to the standard repertory, notably the Beethoven quartets, of which it has presented numerous complete cycles and which it has recorded. The quartet's efforts on behalf of American composers are incalculable; its more than 60 first performances of American works include the Quartets nos.2 and 3 of Elliott Carter, the Quartet no.1 of Leon Kirchner and works by Schuman, Sessions, Piston, Copland, Babbitt, Foss, Mennin, Diamond and many others. Its many recordings include the complete chamber music for strings of Schoenberg, Webern and Carter, Bach's Art of Fugue and the quartets of Debussy, Ravel and Dutilleux. It has appeared throughout the world and at most of the international music festivals, and in 1961 was the first American quartet to visit the USSR. Since Mann's retirement the ensemble sound – once aggressive, impetuous, described as 'contemporary, urban-American' – has become sweeter in tone and more elegant in execution.

Jùjú. African popular music genre performed by the Yoruba of south-west Nigeria. Jùjú music combines indigenous praise-singing and proverbs, the flowing rhythms of social dance drumming and the traditional rhetorical role of the Yoruba talking drum with a variety of foreign influences, including electric guitars and synthesizers, African American soul music, country and western music and themes from Indian film music. Jùjú is performed in a variety of social contexts, including urban nightclubs and life-cycle celebrations such as naming ceremonies, weddings and funerals.

Jùjú music emerged during the early 1930s in the colonial capital of Lagos. The typical ensemble during this early period was a trio consisting of a leader who sang and played the banjo, a shekere bottle-gourd rattle player and a jùjú (tambourine) drummer. The melodic and harmonic materials of early jùjú were influenced by Yoruba folksongs, Christian hymns and contemporaneous urban genres such as palm wine guitar and ashiko music. The pioneers of jùjú music included Tunde King (b 1910), who in 1936 made the first recordings to bear the name of the genre, and Ayinde Bakare, a Yoruba migrant who began recording on the HMV label in 1937.

The first major change in jùjú performing practice was the introduction in 1948 of the talking drum, with its traditional repertory of proverbs and praise-names. The increasing availability of amplified instruments and microphones catalyzed an expansion of ensembles during the 1950s, enabling musicians to incorporate more percussion instruments without upsetting the aural balance between singing and instrumental accompaniment. By the early 1960s, a typical jùjú band included eight or nine musicians. The channelling of singing and guitar through cheap and infrequently serviced tube amplifiers and speakers augmented the dense textures and buzzing timbres of the music. The most influential jùjú musician of the 1960s was I.K. DAIRO (1930–96), an Ijesha Yoruba musician who had a series of hit records around the time of Nigerian Independence (1960). Dairo's recordings for the Decca company were so popular that he was awarded the MBE in 1963.

The most important jùjú performer during the closing decades of the 20th century was 'KING' SUNNY ADÉ (b 1946), who expanded his group to include 16 musicians; the instruments used included five guitars, a keyboard synthesizer, two talking drums and a variety of percussion instruments, and the group also included four chorus vocalists. Adé, who was nicknamed 'Golden Mercury of Africa, Minister of Enjoyment', became one of a small number of Nigerian popular musicians to achieve significant success in the international market. In 1982 Island Records released the album Jùjú Music, which reportedly sold 200,000 copies worldwide; but subsequent releases were less successful, and Adé lost his contract with Island later in the 1980s. At the end of the 1990s, he continued to play to mass audiences in Nigeria and occasionally toured the United States and Europe.

A contemporary jùjú band comprises three main sections made up of singers, percussionists and guitarists. The singers stand in a line at the front of the band; the praise-singer or 'band captain' stands in the middle, flanked on either side by chorus singers. The percussion section includes from one to three talking drums, several conga drums, a set of bongos played with light sticks ('double toy'), a shekere bottle gourd rattle, maracas and an agogo iron bell. Larger and well-financed bands may also include 'jazz drums' (a trap set). These large bands help to boost the reputation of patrons who hire them to perform at parties; they play a role in sustaining an idealized image of Yoruba society as a flexible hierarchy.

Jukebox. Coin-operated phonograph. In 1889 a cylinder phonograph in San Francisco was equipped with four ear-tubes and a coin apparatus that accepted a nickel. The success of this and later devices revived interest in the phonograph, which had enjoyed only a brief success as a novelty and had failed as an office machine for use in the dictation of correspondence. Coin-operated phonographs of this era reproduced recordings acoustically, usually offered only one piece of music and employed primitive coin mechanisms. They were installed in 'phonograph parlors' and penny arcades. By 1908 they had been superseded by the louder player piano and the motion-picture nickelodeon.

Use of coin-operated phonographs grew with the development of machines offering multiple selections and, after their electrification in 1927, amplified music. Although official figures do not exist, it is reported that 25,000 machines were in use in 1933. The repeal of Prohibition in that year marked the beginning of a 'golden age' of jukeboxes, and by 1939 over 300,000 were in use in America. They also served the record industry by providing a showcase for new releases and a barometer of a recording's commercial potential. The major manufacturers of the eye-catching, multicoloured and streamlined machines (see illustration) were Wurlitzer, Rock-Ola, AMI and Seeburg.

In the 1950s the jukebox industry in America was the subject of congressional investigations into the influence of organized crime on machine and record distributors. Competition from other electronic entertainment devices and the diminishing interest in singles, contributed to the decline of the jukebox in the early 1980s although the advent of the compact disc has led to a generation of smaller machines able to offer vastly greater selections of music.

Jula-jula [julu-julu]. PANPIPES of Bolivia. The term jula-jula refers to those of the altiplano and julu-julu to those of the Andes.

Jullet, Herbert (d Paris, 1545). French publisher and partner of ATTAINGNANT, PIERRE.

Jullien, (Jean Lucien) Adolphe (b Paris, 1 June 1845; d Chaintreauville, Seine-et-Marne, 30 Aug 1932). French critic and writer on music. His father, Marcel-Bernard Jullien (b Paris, 2 Feb 1798; d Paris, 15 Oct 1881) was editor of La revue de l'instruction publique and a writer on music; he collaborated with Emile Littré on the musical entries of his Dictionnaire de la langue française (1863–73). Adolphe Jullien was a pupil at the Lycée Charlemagne. He then studied law and took music lessons with Paul Henri Bienaimé, former teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. Graduating in law, he abandoned the bar and chose to write on music. His first article, published in Le ménestrel, was on Schumann's Das Paradies und die Peri. He continued to write for Le ménestrel, and from 1869 collaborated on the Revue et gazette musicale de Paris, until it folded in 1880. From 1888 he wrote for Le Français and the Moniteur universel, and on the death of Ernest Reyer in 1893 he joined the Journal des débats as music critic, remaining there until 1928. From 1883 his fame was such that he became the subject of a monograph distributed in Paris and Brussels (Delhasse).

Naturally inquisitive, Jullien was attracted by creators of his period; he was a passionate admirer of Wagner and a defender of Berlioz, César Franck, Edouard Lalo, Emmanuel Chabrier and Debussy, but hostile towards Gounod and Saint-Saëns. A painting by Henri Fantin-Latour depicts him alongside fellow-Wagnerians Vincent d'Indy and Chabrier. Jullien attended all the Parisian concerts of Wagner's works, and also went to Bayreuth (in 1892, where his attendance was noted by Lavignac); he was the only French critic at the Concert Pasdeloup to recognize in the march from Götterdämmerung 'an incomparable greatness and sadness' (Le Français, Oct 1876). Jullien dedicated a work to Wagner in 1888, declaring in the preface: 'For 20 years I have not stopped defending you'. Debussy appreciated Jullien's writings, particularly his work on Berlioz which he declared was 'admirably documented' (Gil Blas, 8 May 1903). Although Jullien was sometimes an uneasy critic of Debussy, both were followers of the same avant garde, united in their passionate admiration of Lalo's music, particularly his ballet Namouna.

Jullien was inspired by history, above all in the first years of his professional musical life, and he wrote many articles and historical essays on the musical life of the 18th century, using unedited archival materials. 'Like others of his colleagues, he contributed to returning the Revue et gazette musicale to the path of serious historical study' (Pougin). Some of these essays were published in his lifetime, collected in volumes. His erudition and his often criticized flowery style were the source of his success; his respect for creators and his appetite for the new meant that he was among the most avant-garde individuals of the musical life of his time.

BRIGITTE MASSIN

Jullien, Gilles (b c1650–53; d Chartres, 14 Sept 1703). French composer and organist. We can deduce his approximate date of birth from his burial certificate, which describes him as being 50 years old or thereabouts. He held only one post, as organist of Chartres Cathedral, to which he was appointed at the exceptionally early age of between 14 and 17 at a date assumed to be 6 December 1667; his eldest son, Jean-François, succeeded him after his death.

All Jullien's surviving music is contained in his Premier livre d'orgue (Paris, 1690; ed. N. Dufourcq, Paris, 1952); a second volume was contemplated but never published, and a vocal work, La crèche de Bethléem, described as 'Cantique sur la naissance de Notre-Seigneur', is lost. Wherever he learnt his craft he was certainly familiar with current Parisian techniques. His organbook, which appeared in the same year as Couperin's Messes d'orgue, consists of 80 pieces assembled in eight sets in each of the church modes; apart from a fugue on Ave maris stella this is their sole link with the liturgy. Except for an opening prelude there is no uniformity between the sets in the number of pieces or in their forms: the book is an anthology rather than a series of groups of pieces to be played consecutively. The occasional directions, 'gayement', 'gravement' and 'lentement', suggest mood and tempo, though the first two may refer equally to the use of positif and grand orgue respectively. While registration is implicit in some titles, Jullien suggested schemes for certain pieces, notably those in five parts, of which he claimed to be the originator, though they had appeared in books published by Gigault in 1685 and by Raison in 1688.

The dialogues are of mixed quality. They possess a superficial vitality not inherent in the music but arising from tempo changes, registration and other external factors. In the best (3[e], 4[e], 5[e] tons) the opening material is purposefully treated. Fugal writing is seldom a strong point with 17th- and 18th-century French composers, and Jullien is no exception. His fugues are badly organized, showing neither compactness nor growth. The duos and associated pieces for solo stops are more successful. The Trio pour une élévation (3[e] ton) is memorable for its intrinsic worth and because Jullien included notes inégales to demonstrate how such pieces should be performed. The highlights of the collection are the preludes, which are generally more compact and more solidly contrapuntal. Apart from a unified Fantesie cromatique Jullien's occasional excursions into chromaticism are not very happy. Unusually in such a book at this period he included, at the end, a choral work, Cantantibus organis.

G.B. SHARP/FRANÇOIS SABATIER

Jullien, Louis (George Maurice Adolphe Roch Albert Abel Antonio Alexandre Noé Jean Lucien Daniel Eugène Joseph-le-brun Joseph-Barême Thomas Thomas Thomas-Thomas Pierre Arbon Pierre-Maurel Barthélemi Artus Alphonse Bertrand Dieudonné Emanuel Josué Vincent Luc Michel Jules-de-la-plane Jules-Bazin Julio César) (b Sisteron, 23 April 1812; d Paris, 14 March 1860). French conductor and composer. He published under both his surname and his various Christian names – e.g. Roch-Albert – bestowed by his 36 godfathers, members of the Sisteron Philharmonic. Considered something of a child prodigy by his violinist-bandmaster father Antonio, Jullien served in the army before entering the Paris Conservatoire in 1833 or 1831. He left in 1836, preferring dance music over counterpoint. For the next three years, Jullien's lively entertainments of dance music at the Jardin Turc brought rapid popularity, rivalling Musard's, and three duels brought notoriety. He left Paris for England in 1838.

Jullien's first concert there was at the Drury Lane Theatre (8 June 1840), in a series of 'concerts d'été' with Eliason. Over the following 19 years Jullien's activities comprised at least 24 promenade concert seasons in the London theatres, four summer seasons, notably of Monster Concerts at the Surrey Zoological Gardens, one and often two provincial tours each year, numerous engagements at balls and private social functions, a season of grand opera (1847), a highly successful tour, at the invitation of P.T. Barnum, of the USA (1853–4), where he gave 214 concerts in less than a year, a tour of the Netherlands (1857) and private novelty-seeking trips to the Continent.

Jullien's declared aim was 'to ensure amusement as well as attempting instruction, by blending in the programmes the most sublime works with those of a lighter school' (Illustrated London News, 9 November 1850). His audience was the one-shilling public. Nevertheless, as early as his first London season he gave at least four complete Beethoven symphonies. The more substantial fare appeared in a mélange, or musical sandwich, of quadrilles, instrumental solos, galops, waltzes, popular overtures and movements from the favourite symphonies. Pride of place in a Jullien programme went to the season's quadrille, often based on a topical theme: the British Navy Quadrille (1845), the Swiss Quadrille (1847), the Great Exhibition Quadrille (1851) and – perhaps the most celebrated of all – the British Army Quadrilles for orchestra and four military bands (1846; see ORCHESTRA, fig.16). His sure command of all the orchestrator's tricks-of-the-trade gave a surface charm to what was usually second-rate music. Occasionally it led to excesses, such as the four ophicleides, saxophone and side drums that decorated Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Jullien had a shrewd eye for publicity and the serio-comic. He undeniably educated the public during his career, but he was no reformer; his success was due to his creating new trends and being in the vanguard. He became a household name and, as a target for the caricaturists, rivalled the leading politicians. But Jullien's regular appearances in Punch, where he was referred to as 'the Mons', were seldom to his detriment. His dress was that of the dandy: raven locks, superb black moustache, coat widely open over gleaming white waistcoat and elegantly embroidered shirt-front. His red velvet and gilt chair and elaborately decorated music stand were even taken on tour. He conducted Beethoven with a jewelled baton handed to him on a silver salver. This cult of the conductor was new. Behind the pantomime and showmanship lay authority, and Jullien was a pioneer in conducting with the baton. He was able to attract the best of the London players into his orchestras and retained a team of first-class soloists over a number of years.

An ill-planned season of grand opera at the Drury Lane Theatre, beginning in December 1847 with Berlioz as conductor, caused his first bankruptcy in England. Berlioz's grimly amusing account describes him as fundamentally honest but with 'the incontestable character of a madman'. A publishing business started in 1844 had to be sold to pay off debts. The production of his own reputedly extravagant opera Pietro il grande at Covent Garden in August 1852 was withdrawn after five performances. The full score is lost, as are the scores for all his major works (some of them were destroyed in the 1856 Covent Garden fire). He also lost heavily in the collapse of the Surrey Garden Company in 1857.

After giving farewell concerts in London and the provinces (1858–9, playing his Hymn of Universal Harmony everywhere), Jullien arrived back in Paris in May 1859. Plans for a huge 'Universal Musical Tour' were abandoned and both Rivière and Berlioz described his increasing instability; the last month or so of his life was spent in a lunatic asylum, where he died. His wife outlived him; their only son, Louis, also conducted promenade concerts (somewhat unsuccessfully) at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1863 and 1864.

In the democratization of music and the establishment of the early promenade concert, Jullien's role was significant. Natural reserve and reaction against flamboyance by the musical establishment may account for some of the grudging contemporary accounts of his achievement. Davison, however, was a supporter and personal friend: 'M. Jullien', he wrote in the Musical World, 'was undoubtedly the first who directed the attention of the multitude to the classical composers . . . [he] broke down the barriers and let in the "crowd".'

KEITH HORNER

Jumentier, Bernard (b Chavannes, nr Chartres, 24 March 1749; d Saint Quentin, Aisne, 17 Dec 1829). French composer. The son of a wine-grower, he was a student at the choir school at Chartres (16 April 1756 to 1767), where he studied with Demongeot and Michel Delalande. A mass composed by him was performed there on All Saints' Day in 1766. In 1767 he became maître de musique at Senlis Cathedral, but a year later was forced to return to Chartres owing to illness. He then held similar posts at Saint Malo and Coutances until 1776 when he settled permanently at the church of Saint Quentin as maître de musique. In the 1780s his sacred compositions were performed in several parts of France, including Le Mans, Versailles and Paris. His sole appearance at the Paris Concert Spirituel (2 February 1783) was in the performance of a motet à grand choeur, which the Journal de Paris reported 'was heard with pleasure' while the Mercure de France remarked more candidly, 'We shall say nothing of the Abbé Jumentier's motet; it is a genre in which the public has for a long time taken hardly any interest'.

When in 1793 the church of Saint Quentin was confiscated by the Revolutionaries, Jumentier lived as a private music teacher and provided music for Revolutionary fêtes, returning to his post when the church reopened in 1802 even though it was unable to pay him for his services. Late in life he married Marie-Anna Maillard; the couple remained childless. In the early decades of the 19th century Jumentier's music was once again heard in Paris. On 21 November 1812, for instance, a Mass in G was performed at Saint Eustache to celebrate St Cecilia's Day; the orchestra, chorus and soloists of the Opéra were assisted by musicians from other Parisian theatres and conducted by Rodolphe Kreutzer; a contemporary review reported that 'the music is full of verve, and bears the hallmark of a genius by turns pleasant and excitable'. Jumentier retired in 1825; his own Requiem Mass was performed at his funeral service at Saint Quentin.

NEAL ZASLAW

Jumièges. Benedictine abbey in northern France. St Pierre de Jumièges was founded in 654 by St Philibert (*c*616–85), its first abbot. By the 8th century it ranked with Fontenelle and St Taurin d'Evreux as one of the most important monasteries in Neustria. The first half of the 9th century, however, brought a series of disasters, above all the Norman raids. The raid of 851 left the cloister in ruins; the monks fled, most of them to Haspres near Cambrai and some to St Denis. According to the preface of Notker's Liber hymnorum, one of the fleeing monks eventually found his way to St Gallen (*c*860), carrying with him an antiphoner (probably an antiphonale missarum) containing proses (versus ad sequentias) that inspired Notker's own work.

Refounded in 934, the cloister regained its wealth throughout the 11th and 12th centuries, particularly under William the Conqueror, and extended its influence to England. After a period of prosperity lasting until the 14th century, the Hundred Years War brought renewed hardships to Jumièges. The 16th century was a period of relative stability for the abbey despite the sack by the Huguenots in 1562, but the 17th and 18th centuries saw a gradual decline ending with the dissolution in 1790, when a part of the library was destroyed and another part moved to the municipal library at Rouen.

The most important period in the history of music at Jumièges was the period before the destruction of 851, when the abbey appears to have played a central role in the early development of the sequence and the prose. The earliest reports of textless melismas to alleluias and responsories (apart from St Augustine's ambiguous mention of the jubilus), for example, the neuma triplex mentioned by Amalarius of Metz, the rubric 'cum sequentia' added to some of the alleluias of the Mont-Blandin Antiphoner, and the canon of the Council of Medux (845) come from the first half of the 9th century, but no source of sequences or proses dates from before about 900 (Crocker has compiled a list of sources). Yet from Notker's account it is clear that at Jumièges sequences, proses and perhaps tropes were being sung and copied before 851. Jumièges is thus among the earliest places from which there is unambiguous evidence of the singing and copying of sequences and proses, and this evidence supports the view that proses and tropes originated in Jumièges and other Neustrian and Lotharingian cloisters perhaps around the turn of the 9th century. No liturgical manuscripts from Jumièges survived the Norman raids and the dispersion of the community in 851. In later centuries, however, the abbey built up a rich music library, with manuscripts showing its close ties with England during the 11th and 12th centuries. The surviving manuscripts, now at Rouen, have been catalogued by Hesbert.

ALEJANDRO ENRIQUE PLANCHART

Jumilhac, Pierre-Benoît de (b Château de St Jean-Ligourre, nr Limoges, 1611; d Paris, 1682, probably 21 March, but possibly 22 March or 21 April). French ecclesiastic and theorist. After studying in Bordeaux, he became a novice of the Benedictine order in the Congregation of St Maur at St Remi, Reims, in 1629 and professed to that order on 6 April 1630. Following his studies in Reims, Jumilhac travelled to Rome. On returning to France he was appointed prior of St Julien, Tours (1647), superior first at Chelles and then (1651) at St Nicaise, Reims, and after a brief stay in Toulouse, assistant to the head abbot of his congregation (1654). He next spent some years as prior at St Corneille in Compiègne (from 1660) and at St Fiacre before retiring to the abbey of St Germain-des-Prés in 1666. It was while he was there that he produced his major work devoted to music, an extensive treatise on plainchant entitled La science et la pratique du plain-chant, où tout ce qui appartient à la pratique est étably par les principes de la science, et confirmé par le témoignage des anciens philosophes, des pères de l'église, et des plus illustres musiciens (Paris, 1673, ed. T. Nisard and A. Le Clercq, Paris, 1847; the original edn is incorrectly attributed to Jacques Le Clerc in several early sources). The work is based on a systematic review of the principles, theory and history of chant, all in the interest of better performance. Of particular note in the treatise are the parts devoted to mensuration and modality; the former deals with unmeasured time values and the role of accent in chant as well as with the metric nature of certain portions of chant, where Jumilhac advocated a new notation, and in the latter he advanced a system of 12 modes. The treatise was well thought of in its day, and references to it are not infrequent in 18th-century sources.

Even if he took much of his inspiration from the writings of Le Clérc, Jumilhac is distinguished from him by a fine sense of historical methodology reminiscent of that brought to bear by Dom Jean Mabillon. His work is dominated by a critical approach and the study of his sources, and is more valuable for its method than its contents, its propositions rather than its results (which are identical with those of Jacques Le Clerc). Nonetheless, Jumilhac contributed to the purification movement deriving from the research into the liturgy undertaken by the Maurists. That pretext concealed the more or less avowed intention of returning to the forms and practices of a Christian antiquity supposed to be endowed with every perfection.

ALBERT COHEN

Junck, Benedetto (b Turin, 21 Aug 1852; d S Vigilio, nr Bergamo, 3 Oct 1903). Italian composer of Alsatian descent. At the insistence of his father, he studied mathematics in Turin and then entered a commercial firm in Paris. His real inclination was to music and he played the piano, although he had never studied music seriously. The decisive impetus to improve his musical knowledge came from hearing the major symphonic works in Paris. In 1870 he returned to Turin for military service. After his father's death in 1872 he entered the Milan Conservatory (1874), where he was taught harmony and counterpoint by Alberto Mazzucato and later by Antonio Bazzini. He and his wife organized in their home a series of celebrated musical evenings, attended by the best-known musical figures of Milan. He was a close friend of Alfredo Catalani, whose portrait, now in the Museo Civico of Turin, he commissioned from Tranquillo Cremona.

Of Junck's few compositions, consisting of songs and chamber music, the most original is the song cycle La Simona; elegantly written, gentle, mournful and delicate in its inspiration, it is typical of the twilight world of late Romanticism and consists of rapid, fleeting images.

After completing a degree in music education at the Heidelberg-Mannheim Musikhochschule in 1969, he studied musicology at Heidelberg University, where he worked as research assistant from 1972. He took the doctorate at Heidelberg in 1976 and in 1980 joined the faculty of the Musikhochschule as a music theory and history teacher. In 1983 he was appointed professor of musicology at the Musikhochschule. Jungbauer, Coelestin [Ferdinand] (b Grattersdorf, Bavaria, 6 July 1747; d Ingolstadt, 25 March 1823). German priest and composer. The son of a church musician, he received his first musical training at home, and his basic academic and musical education in the Benedictine monastery at Niederaltaich, Bavaria. Later he studied philosophy and theology at Freising and Salzburg. In 1769 he entered the Benedictine order at Niederaltaich and in 1772 was ordained priest. He taught poetry in the Gymnasium at Straubing (from 1781) and Amberg (1784), was the parish priest of Dettingen, near Metzingen (1785), and Grossmehring, near Ingolstadt (1788), and priest of the Liebfrauenmünster, Ingolstadt (1817). Jungbauer composed sacred and secular vocal works, mainly during the period 1785–1800. His religious works, modelled on those of Michael Haydn, reflect the endeavours of the Enlightenment in their sentimental parallel 3rds and 6ths and in their German texts.

Jünger, Patricia (b on an aeroplane between Dublin and Vienna, 6 Aug 1951). Austrian-Swiss composer. She studied composition, the piano, the organ and conducting at the Vienna Music Academy and pursued further studies in Frankfurt and Paris. Many of her compositions are inspired by feminist documents and other works of women's literature. Muttertagsfeier oder Die Zerstückelung des weiblichen Körpers (1984), Die Erziehung eines Vampirs (1986) and the opera Die Klavierspielerin (1988) draw on texts by the Viennese writer Elfriede Jelinek. Sehr geehrter Herr – Ein Requiem, a radio play based on a letter by Emilie Kempin-Spyri, the first Swiss woman to complete the doctorate in law, won the Karl Sczuka prize in 1986. Valse Eternelle – Ein Brief, a radio play on Ria Endres's Milena antwortet, received an award from the Frankfurt Academy of Art in 1989.

Jünger describes later works as 'acoustic art' or 'total art works' that reproduce segments of natural acoustic sounds through electronic means. In 1996, aided by four divers equipped with microphones, she investigated the sounds of the river Rhine. The composition was later documented in the studio production Transmitter. First to Second Nature – Vom Flussbett zur Flutung.

ANDREA ZSCHUNKE

Jungle. A form of 20th-century club dance music: It is a fusion of the spartan, extremely low bass lines of dub reggae, the frantic, syncopated snare drum breakbeats of hardcore (themselves originally sampled from American hip hop and electro music) and, on occasion, rapping similar to that found on ragga records. However, it is defined by its rhythmic patterns coupled to an extremely fast tempo of around 160 beats per minute, a third faster than most house music. Jungle originated in the UK in the early 1990s at the Rage club with DJs including Groov-erider and Fabio. The predominant rhythms of the original 'hard jungle' music were, in turn, the driving influence behind drum 'n' bass, which on the surface sounds extremely similar. However, drum 'n' bass is in fact a slightly less frenetic music still using complicated syncopated rhythms, but with a greater reliance on melody and an increased use of non-diatonic chordal washes similar to those found in some ambient techno music. By 1998, drum 'n' bass had become more popular than jungle, with protagonists like Goldie and Reprazent attaining critical and commercial success with albums (Timeless and New Forms respectively) that crossed into the mainstream and cemented the style as more than just a passing fad.

WILL FULFORD-JONES

Jungwirth, Manfred (b St Pölten, 4 June 1919). Austrian bass. He studied in St Pölten and Vienna, making his début in 1942 at Bucharest as Méphistophélès and Heinrich der Vogler (Lohengrin). Engaged at Innsbruck (1945), Zürich (1948) and Frankfurt (1960), he also sang at the Komische Oper, Berlin, and Deutsche Oper am Rhein. He made his British début in 1965 at Glyndebourne as Ochs, which was also his début role at the Vienna Staatsoper (1967), San Francisco (1971), the Metropolitan (1974) and Dallas (1982). He created the Vicar in von Einem's Besuch der alten Dame (1971, Vienna). His repertory also included such roles as Osmin, Rocco, which he sang at La Scala (1978), Count Waldner (Arabella), the role of his Covent Garden début (1981), and La Roche (Capriccio), which he sang at Salzburg (1985) and Florence (1987). Jungwirth's ripe, dark-coloured voice and comic talents were displayed to best advantage as Ochs, which he recorded with Solti.

ALAN BLYTH

Junker, Carl Ludwig (b Kirchberg an der Jagst, 3 Aug 1748; d Ruppertshofen, 30 May 1797). German writer on music and art and composer. His early childhood was spent at the South German court of Hohenlohe-Kirchberg, where his father was court councillor and his godfather, Johann Valentin Tischbein, court painter. Educated alongside the prince's son, he received lessons in music and art; later he attended gymnasiums in Nuremberg and Giessen, then matriculated at the University of Göttingen (April 1769) to study theology. After graduating he spent several years as tutor, then lived in Switzerland (1774–7) before returning to Kirchberg to be made deacon and, in 1779, court chaplain. He held subsequent appointments as pastor in Dettingen (1789), Lendsiedel (1792) and Ruppertshofen (1795).

Junker wrote an almost equal number of essays on art and music, frequently comparing the two. His writings on music are concerned exclusively with current styles – he was probably the only writer of his generation to so restrict himself – as he considered himself a historian of what he termed a 'musical revolution' which he dated from about 1740. Based on 'sentimentality' (Empfindsamkeit) as the yardstick of judgment, his criticism covers a range of subjects including observations of the music at leading courts (Mannheim, Stuttgart, Cologne, Ansbach); discussions of tempo, conducting techniques, and the affective properties of instruments; and arguments for music as an 'expressive' rather than 'imitative' art. Junker also played several instruments (flute, keyboard, cello) and composed symphonies, concertos, a melodrama, songs and keyboard pieces.

ROYE E. WATES

Junta. See GIUNTA family.

Juon [Yuon], Paul [Pavel Fedorovich] (b Moscow, 23 Feb/6 March 1872; d Vevey, 21 Aug 1940). German composer of Russian birth and Swiss and German descent. He attended a German school in Moscow, and in 1889 entered the Imperial Conservatory to study the violin with Hřímaly and composition with Arensky and Taneyev. From 1894 to 1895 he studied in Berlin with Woldemar Bargiel at the Hochschule für Musik, where he won the Mendelssohn Prize. For a year he taught the violin and theory at the Baku Conservatory, but he came back to Berlin in 1897 and settled there. He taught composition at the Hochschule from 1906, becoming professor in 1911. Among his pupils were Philipp Jarnach, Hans Chemin-Petit, Heinrich Kaminski and Stefan Wolpe. In 1919 he was elected to the Prussian Academy of Arts. Ill-health forced him to retire to Vevey in 1934.

Juon's major works are orchestral and chamber pieces in traditional genres. The orchestration and musical style of his early works, such as the Symphony in A op.23 with its cyclic form, suggest a combined Germanic-Slavonic heritage from Tchaikovsky and Dvořák. It was probably his numerous chamber works for strings with or without piano that earned him the label of 'the Russian Brahms'. Although the large-scale conception of his works is Germanic, Russian influences are clearly evident in the themes, where devices common to Russian folksong, such as 5/4 metre and diatonic melodies constructed primarily from 2nds and 3rds, are often found. He was also strongly influenced by Scandinavian music, having revised a great number of works by Sibelius for his Berlin publishers.

Juon's training as a violinist led him to prefer that instrument: his three violin concertos are conventional in form, while his small pieces for violin and piano are sentimental concert or parlour pieces in ternary, rounded binary or dance forms. A number of Juon's later works, such as the Piano Trio op.70, the Clarinet Sonata op.82 and the orchestral Burletta op.97, telescope four-movement form into a single movement with internal sections corresponding to the scherzo and slow movement. Although Juon's style remained Romantic throughout his career, a few late works, such as the fifth movement of the Suite op.89 for piano trio, show a tentative adoption of neo-classical techniques, in this case a non-functional modal harmony. In addition, Juon's idiosyncratic arrangement of asymmetrical types of metre, manifested in these works, foreshadows the 'variable metre' techniques initiated by another Berlin-based composer, Boris Blacher, during the 1950s.

Jurayev, Sheraly (b Muday, Fergana Basin, 12 Dec 1947). Uzbek singer. He absorbed the ideas about Uzbek traditional vocal style elaborated by Hofez Kamildjan Ataniyazov of Khorezm and the Andijan Hofez Mamurjan Uzzakov. Jurayev studied at the Uzbek State Institute of Theatre Art (1967–72) and performed as an actor and singer in films and in the theatre. He has since devoted himself to performing at weddings, creating a unique presentation with a dramatic flavour at each wedding. He is noted for his skill in improvisation. His repertory comprises approximately 600 songs, about half of which are his own compositions; his performances include songs in a classical style setting the work of mystical medieval poets, songs influenced by the music of neighbouring countries including Afghanistan, India, Turkey and Pakistan, and modern lyrical songs, many of which have gained widespread popularity. In 1981 the Uzbek government awarded him the title of Honoured Artist of Uzbekistan, and his vocal style has been imitated by wedding singers throughout Uzbekistan.

Jürgens, Jürgen (b Frankfurt, 5 Oct 1925; d Hamburg, 4 Aug 1994). German conductor. He studied from 1946 to 1953 at the Staatliche Musikhochschule in Freiburg under Konrad Lechner. In 1955 he was appointed director of the Hamburg Monteverdi Choir and in 1960 he became director of the Akademische Musikpflege and a lecturer in music theory at Hamburg University, where he became professor in 1972. With the Hamburg Monteverdi Choir, whose repertory extended from Ockeghem and Josquin to Henze and Dallapiccola, he gave many concerts in Europe, the Near East and the USA to wide acclaim and also made numerous recordings. Under his direction, the choir achieved a relaxed choral sound of seemingly effortless virtuosity. Jürgens collaborated with Harnoncourt in recordings of Monteverdi's Vespers and Telemann's Der Tag des Gerichts (both 1966), which were influential for the development of period performance in the late 1960s and early 70s. He published new editions of works by Monteverdi, Alessandro Scarlatti and others.

Jürgenson [Yurgenson], Pyotr Ivanovich (b Reval [now Tallinn], 5/17 July 1836; d Moscow, 20 Dec 1903/2 Jan 1904). Russian music publisher. He was educated in Reval, and in 1850 was sent to St Petersburg, where from 1855 to 1859 he was an engraver at F.T. Stellovsky's publishing house. In 1859 he was appointed manager at the publishing house of C.F. Schildbach in Moscow, but in 1861, with the help of Nikolay Rubinstein, he established a music publishing business of his own, expanding this in 1867 to include a printing works. Between 1870 and 1903 he bought out at least 17 smaller firms, including Bernard in 1885, Meykov in 1889 and Sokolov in 1896, and the business rapidly became the largest in Russia. He opened a branch in Leipzig in 1897 and later established links with a number of other foreign cities. Jürgenson was the principal publisher of Tchaikovsky's works, and he also produced the complete sacred works of Bortnyans'ky under Tchaikovsky's editorship. His catalogue included works by many other Russian composers as well as the piano music of Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Chopin and Schumann, and the operas of Wagner. From 1862 Jürgenson was closely associated with the Moscow branch of the Russian Music Society, and in 1875 was appointed a director. After his death the publishing firm was taken over by his sons, Boris and Grigory. In 1918 it was nationalized and became the music section of the Soviet State Publishing House, which produced, among other things, Boris Jürgenson's invaluable book Ocherk istorii notopechataniya ('A Survey of the History of Music Printing', Moscow, 1928).

GEOFFREY NORRIS/CAROLYN DUNLOP

Jurinac, Sena [Srebrenka] (b Travnik, 24 Oct 1921). Austrian soprano of Yugoslav birth. She studied at the music academy at Zagreb and was a singing pupil of Milka Kostrenčić. She made her début at the Zagreb Opera just after her 21st birthday, as Mimì, and in 1945 she joined the Vienna Staatsoper (Cherubino, 1 May), remaining with the company. She appeared at the Salzburg Festival in 1947, soon after sang Dorabella in two of the Vienna company's performances at Covent Garden, and the following year made a deep impression in the same role with the Glyndebourne Opera Company at the Edinburgh Festival. At Glyndebourne, where she first appeared in 1949 and at once became a great favourite, she impressed with an assumption of Fiordiligi (1950) as accomplished as her Dorabella had been the year before. Although best known early in her career for Mozart, she built up an extensive repertory covering a wide range of parts. She appeared at most of the world's leading opera houses, maturing from roles such as Cherubino, Octavian, Marzelline and Ilia (Idomeneo) to the Countess, the Marschallin, Leonore and Electra. Among her other notable roles were the Composer (Ariadne auf Naxos), Sena Jurinac as Fiordiligi in Mozart's 'Così fan tutte'

the two ladies in Don Giovanni, Elisabeth (Tannhäuser and Don Carlos), Jenůfa, Cio-Cio-San and Tosca, Desdemona, and later Marie (Wozzeck), Poppaea and Iphigenia (Iphigénie en Tauride).

Jurinac's voice was beautifully pure, rich and even throughout its range, and although she did not always sound to best advantage in her numerous recordings, the finest of them faithfully convey the integrity, eloquence and commitment that made an unforgettable impression on two generations of opera-lovers. The ardent, youthful singer of the 1940s and 50s grew into the sensitive, reflective artist of the 60s and 70s. Although she appeared frequently as a concert and lieder singer, she will be remembered as one of the outstanding operatic sopranos of her time, generous of voice and radiant of personality. This is reflected in her recordings of Ilia, Marzelline, Leonore and Octavian.

PETER BRANSCOMBE

Jurjāns, Andrejs (b Ērgļi, Vidzeme, 30 Sept 1856; d Riga, 28 Sept 1922). Latvian composer and folklorist. He was one of the founders of Latvian classical music, graduating at the St Petersburg Conservatory from Lui Homilius's organ class (1880), Rimsky-Korsakov's composition class (1881) and F. Homilius's horn class (1882). He then taught theory at the Russian Imperial Music Society's music school at Kharkiv (1882–1916) and from 1920 lived in Riga. Even when not resident there, he always maintained a close association with the musical life of his native land, giving many concerts as a horn player (sometimes in the Jurjāns brothers' horn quartet) and organist; he was one of the leading conductors in the third, fourth and fifth big Latvian song festivals (1888, 1895 and 1910). He also worked assiduously in studying Latvian folksong melodies, of which he and his colleagues collected about 2700. With the publication of his Latvju tautas mūzikas materiāli ('Materials of Latvian Folk Music', Riga, 1894–1926) scientific Latvian folk music research was established. He published the melodies according to genre, including rich ethnographic materials; his conclusions on the scales of Latvian folksong melodies became the basis of a new understanding of their harmony. As a composer Jurjāns developed particularly the genres of choral song, cantata, folksong arrangement and orchestral piece in Latvia, making frequent use of folk materials. His work deeply influenced the evolution of Latvian music.

Jurjević, Athanasius. See GEORGICEUS, ATHANASIUS.

Jurmann, Walter (b Vienna, 12 Oct 1903; d Budapest, 17 June 1971). American composer of Austrian birth. Born into a solidly middle-class family, Jurmann received a comprehensive humanist education that included music. Abandoning medical studies at Vienna University in 1927, he moved to Berlin where he worked as a bar pianist, and a composer and song crooner for the newly founded Ultraphon record company. He joined with Fritz Rotter (1900–84), one of the most successful lyricists of his time with 1200 lyrics to his credit, and their first collaboration resulted in the big hit Was weisst denn du, wie ich verliebt bin for the tenor Richard Tauber. Jurmann prolifically adapted to the requirements of the thriving industry of popular music, making his name with Veronika, der Lenz ist da (which became the signature tune for the vocal quintet the Comedian Harmonists) and various hit songs that were interpreted by the leading singers of the day, such as Greta Keller, Alfred Piccaver, Jan Kiepura, Helge Rosvaenge, Benjamino Gigli and Hans Albers.

A successful transition into sound movies followed when Rotter introduced him to Bronislaw Kaper. For the next 12 years the partnership of Jurmann and Kaper proved to be one of the most successful and long lasting of its kind. For some 24 films in Germany, France and the USA Jurmann provided the melodies, while Kaper produced the arrangements and orchestrations. Among their most popular musical collaborations are the films A Night at the Opera (including Cosi Cosa; 1935), Mutiny on the Bounty (Love Song of Tahiti; 1935), San Francisco (San Francisco; 1936), A Day at the Races (All God's chillun got rhythm; 1937) and Nice Girl? (Thank you, America; 1941). In 1938 he was awarded the honorary citizenship of San Francisco for San Francisco, while the song itself was proclaimed the official city song by popular demand in 1984. Jurmann's death occurred unexpectedly during a trip to Europe in 1971.

THOMAS L. GAYDA

Jurowski, Vladimir (b Moscow, 1972). Russian conductor. He moved with his family to Germany when he was 13 and finished his studies in Dresden and Berlin, being taught by Colin Davis and Semion Skigin. In 1993, at the age of 21, he was made chief conductor of the Sibelius Orchestra in Berlin, keeping the appointment for three years. He championed modern music at his concerts with his ensemble United Berlin. He came to international prominence in 1995 conducting Rimsky-Korsakov's May Night at the Wexford Festival. In 1997 he was acclaimed for his conducting of Rossini's Moïse et Pharaon at the Rossini festival in Pesaro, for his Fidelio at the Deutsche Oper, Berlin, and for his Macbeth at the Komische Oper in Berlin. His British début, in December 1998, was with the WNO in an enthusiastic reading of Hänsel und Gretel. Later that month Jurowski was praised for his conducting of Rimsky's The Golden Cockerel with Covent Garden at Sadler's Wells Theatre. His Metropolitan début followed in 2000 with an admired Rigoletto. His impassioned reading of Werther on disc was a further success. In addition to the youthful vigour he brings to all his work, he uncovers a wealth of subtle detail in his interpretations.

Just, Johann August (b Gröningen, *c*1750; d ?The Hague, Dec 1791). German keyboard player, composer and violinist. According to early chroniclers, he studied with Kirnberger in Berlin and subsequently with Schwindl at The Hague. By 1767 he was at the court of William V, Prince of Orange and Nassau, where he served as music master to Princess Wilhelmine; he remained connected with the court throughout his career. Early in his life he may have visited London; by 1772 his publications there had reached op.3, and most works published on the Continent were promptly reprinted in London. Fétis's statement that Just followed the court into exile in England (January 1795) must be false, as royal archives imply an earlier death. As Burney wrote only on deceased composers for Rees's Cyclopaedia, Just must have died before Burney's brief article on him was written (*c*1804).

Just was described by Gerber as being among 'the best keyboard players in the new manner'. His compositions are largely for keyboard, but he also wrote at least three Singspiele, of which De Koopman van Smyrna was performed in German translation in Bonn and Frankfurt in 1783. The style of the Singspiele resembles the popular works of J.A. Hiller, but they also share characteristics with current Parisian comedies. The keyboard works are marked by their frankly pedagogic orientation and include many sonatinas and divertimentos; use of the latter title, two-part writing and other points of style suggest the possible influence of the widely circulated keyboard music of Wagenseil. Keyboard publications include variations on popular songs; one set (1773) used 'Lison dormait dans un bocage' from Dezède's Julie. (It was later similarly used by Mozart in his nine variations K264.) Just's simple pieces generally possess refinement and charm and are still attractive teaching material. At a time when the piano was coming into vogue his teaching collections continued to specify the harpsichord. Many sets include fashionable violin accompaniments, but in op.6 the violin is obbligato and a true concertante equality between the instruments often results. Fétis's attribution to Just of the keyboard method New and Compleat Instructions for the Harpsichord, Piano-Forte or Organ (London, *c*1798) has not been verified but is reinforced by Just's lifelong concern with didactic materials and by selections in it entitled 'The Prince's Favourite' and 'Stadtholder's Minuet'. (A possible alternative compiler is the court pianist J.A. Colizzi.)

Just, Martin (b Uslar, 17 April 1930). German musicologist. He studied the piano and conducting at the Hochschule für Musik in Stuttgart (1950–56) and musicology with Gerstenberg from 1955 at Tübingen University, where he took the doctorate with a dissertation on Isaac's motets. After working as a teaching assistant for Reichert at Würzburg University, he completed the Habilitation in 1972 with a study on the mensural codex D-Bsb 40021.

He was appointed professor of musicology in 1978 at Würzburg and in 1982 he joined the editorial board of the new Josquin collected edition; he was made an editor at the journal Musikforschung in 1986. On the occassion of his 60th birthday he was honoured with the Festschrift Von Isaac bis Bach: Studien zur älteren deutschen Musikgeschichte (ed. F. Heidlberger, W. Osthoff and R. Wiesend, Kassel, 1991).

Just has focussed on the music of the Renaissance, examining in particular its sources, and editing and analysing the repertory. He has also used his analytical skills to explore the music of the Viennese Classics and the music of the 19th and 20th century. A prolific author, Just has established himself of one the foremost Renaissance music scholars in Germany through his carefully prepared editions and numerous publications.

LORENZ WELKER

Justice, Richard (d Hull, Nov 1757). English harpsichordist, organist and composer. He was in Hull by 1751, where he competed unsuccessfully for the position of organist at Holy Trinity; his supporters, many of whom were merchants in the whale trade, funded an organ commission granted to John Snetzler on behalf of St Mary's (Lowgate) with the proviso that they select the future organist. Justice was elected immediately after the organ was completed in 1755 and served until his death only two years later. He left only his Six Sets of Lessons for the Harpsichord (London, 1757). Each one comprises three movements, mostly italianate in style and with melodies that are highly ornate and idiomatic, though quite repetitive. The influence of Domenico Scarlatti is evident in much of the passage-work, as is an affinity with the music of Handel's younger English contemporaries.

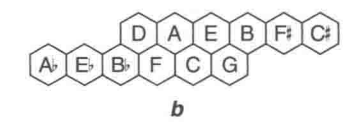
Just [pure] intonation. When pitch can be intoned with a modicum of flexibility, the term 'just intonation' refers to the consistent use of harmonic intervals tuned so pure that they do not beat, and of melodic intervals derived from such an arrangement, including more than one size of whole tone. On normal keyboard instruments, however, the term refers to a system of tuning in which some 5ths (often including D–A or else G–D) are left distastefully smaller than pure in order that the other 5ths and most of the 3rds will not beat (it being impossible for all the concords on a normal keyboard instrument to be tuned pure; see TEMPERAMENTS, §1). The defect of such an arrangement can be mitigated by the use of an elaborate keyboard.

1. General theory. 2. Instruments.



1. General theory. In theory, each justly intoned interval is represented by a numerical ratio. The larger number in the ratio represents the greater string length on the traditional Monochord and hence the lower pitch; in terms of wave frequencies it represents the higher pitch. The ratio for the octave is 2:1; for the 5th 3:2; for the 4th 4:3. Pythagorean intonation shares these pure intervals with just intonation, but excludes from its ratios any multiples of 5 or any higher prime number, whereas just-intonation theory admits multiples of 5 in order to provide for pure 3rds and 6ths.

To find the ratio for the sum of two intervals their ratios are multiplied; the ratio for the difference between two intervals is found by dividing their ratios. In Pythagorean intonation the whole tone normally has the ratio 9:8 (obtained by dividing the ratio of the 5th by that of the 4th), and so the major 3rd has the ratio 81:64 (obtained by squaring 9:8). But a pure major 3rd has the ratio 5:4, which is the same as 80:64 and thus smaller than 81:64. (The discrepancy between the two (81:80) is called the syntonic comma and amounts to about one ninth of a whole tone.) Since 5:4 divided by 9:8 equals 40:36, or rather 10:9 (a comma less than 9:8), just intonation has two different sizes of whole tone – a feature that tends to go against the grain of musical common sense and gives rise to various practical as well as theoretical complications. Some 18th-century advocates of just intonation and others since have admitted ratios with multiples of 7 (such as 7:5 for the diminished 5th in a dominant 7th chord; see Septimal system).

Two medieval British theorists, Theinred of Dover and Walter Odington, suggested that the proper ratio for a major 3rd might be 5:4 rather than 81:64, and some 15th-century manuscript treatises on clavichord making include quintal and, in one instance, septimal ratios (see Lindley, 1980). Quintal ratios were introduced into the mainstream of Renaissance musical thought by Ramis de Pareia, whose famous theoretical monochord (1482) provided just intonation for the notes of traditional plainchant, but with G–D, B♭–G and D–B implicitly left a comma impure (fig.1*a*). Thence Ramis derived the 12-note scale by adding two 5ths on the flat side (A♭ and E♭) and two on the sharp (F♯ and C♯); in this scheme (fig.1*b*), C♯–A♭ would make a good 5th, hardly 2 cents smaller than pure. Ramis did not intend or expect this tuning to be used in any musical performances, however, for in his last chapter (giving advice to 'cantors' and describing what he called 'instrumenta perfecta') he said that G–D was a good 5th but C♯–A♭ must be avoided (see Temperaments, §2).

Gioseffo Zarlino (1558) argued that although voices accompanied by artificial instruments would match their tempered intonation, good singers when unaccompanied would adhere to the pure intervals of the 'diatonic syntonic' tetrachord which he had selected (following the example of Ramis's disciple, Giovanni Spataro) from Ptolemy's various models of the tetrachord (fig.2*a*). Zarlino eventually became aware that this would entail a sour 5th in any diatonic scale consisting of seven rigidly fixed pitch classes (see fig.2*b*, where D–A is labelled 'dissonant'); but he held that the singers' capacity to intone in a flexible manner would enable them to avoid such problems without recourse to a tempered scale – and that they must do so because otherwise the 'natural' intervals (those with simple ratios) 'would never be put into action', and 'sonorous number ... would be altogether vain and superfluous in Nature'. This metaphysically inspired nonsense was to prove a stimulating irritant in the early development of experimental physics, and during the next three centuries a number of distinguished scientists paid a remarkable amount of attention to the conundrum of just intonation (as well as to various attempts to explain the nature of consonance by something more real than sonorous numbers).

In the 1650s Giovanni Battista Benedetti, a mathematician and physicist, pointed out in two letters to the distinguished composer Cipriano de Rore (who had been Zarlino's predecessor as maestro di cappella at S Marco, Venice) that if progressions such as that shown in ex.1

were sung repeatedly in just intonation, the pitch level would change quite appreciably, going up or down a comma each time. In 1581 Vincenzo Galilei, a former pupil of Zarlino, denied that just intonation was used in vocal music, and asserted that the singers' major 3rd 'is contained in an irrational proportion rather close to 5:4' and that their whole tones made 'two equal parts of the said 3rd'. In the ensuing quarrels, Vincenzo Galilei's search for evidence against Zarlino's mystical doctrine of the 'senario' (the doctrine that the numbers 1–6 are the essence of music) led him to discover by experiment that for any interval the ratio of thicknesses between two strings of equal length is the square root of the ratio of lengths between two strings of equal thickness. This undermined the theoretical status of the traditional ratios of just intonation as far as the eminent Dutch scientist Simon Stevin was concerned; it might have had further consequences had not Galilei retracted in 1589 his 1581 account of vocal intonation, and had not his son Galileo's generation devised the 'pulse' theory of consonance, according to which the eardrum is struck simultaneously by the wave pulses of the notes in any consonant interval or chord (thus mistakenly assuming that the waves are always in phase with one another). A theory such as this tended rather to undermine the concept of tempered consonances, where the wave frequencies are theoretically incommensurate.

Descartes found Stevin's dismissal of simple ratios 'so absurd that I hardly know any more how to reply', but Marin Mersenne advanced the real argument that the superiority of justly intoned intervals is shown by the fact that they do not beat (1636–7). (He probably gained this argument from Isaac Beeckman, who seems to have invented the 'pulse' theory of consonance.) 50 years later, however, Wolfgang Caspar Printz wrote that a 5th tempered by 1/4-comma remains concordant because 'Nature . . . transforms the confusion into a pleasant beating [which] should be taken not as a defect but rather as a perfection and gracing of the 5th'. Andreas Werckmeister agreed (Musicalische Temperatur, 2/1691/R).

About this time Christiaan Huygens developed Benedetti's point (although he did not associate it with Benedetti) in his assertion that if one sings the notes shown in ex.2 slowly, the pitch will fall (just as in ex.1);

Ex.2 Huygens's example of a succession of notes for which the use of just intonation would make the pitch fall

'but if one sings quickly, I find that the memory of the first C keeps the voice on pitch, and thus makes it state the consonant intervals a little falsely'. Rameau stated (Génération harmonique, 1737) that an accompanied singer is guided by the 'temperament of the instruments' only for the 'fundamental sounds' (the roots of the triads), and automatically modifies, in the course of singing the less fundamental notes, 'everything contrary to the just rapport of the fundamental sounds'. While this represents a musicianly departure from the common error that there is something natural about the scheme shown in fig.2*b*, it does rather overlook the fact that the tuning of the 'fundamental sounds' was normally tempered on keyboard instruments and lutes.

The most eminent scientist among 18th-century music theorists, Leonhard Euler, developed an elaborate and remarkably broad mathematical theory of tonal structure (scales, modulations, chord progressions and gradations of consonance and dissonance) based exclusively upon just-intonation ratios. He failed to observe that a 5th tuned a comma smaller than pure sounds sour, and so allowed himself to be misled by an inept passage in Johann Mattheson's Grosse General-Bass-Schule (1731) into supposing that keyboard instruments of his day were actually tuned in just intonation. Euler at first rejected septimal intervals, saying in 1739 that 'they sound too harsh and disturb the harmony', but declared in 1760 that if they were introduced, 'music would be carried to a higher degree' (an idea previously voiced by Mersenne and Christiaan Huygens). He published two articles in 1764 to demonstrate that 'music has now learnt to count to seven' (Leibnitz had said that music could only 'count to five').

Another extreme of theoretical elaboration was reached in the early 19th century by John Farey, a geologist, who reckoned intervals by a combination of three mutually incommensurate units of measurement derived from just-intonation ratios. Farey's largest unit was the 'schisma', which was the difference between the syntonic and Pythagorean commas. (The Pythagorean comma is the amount by which six Pythagorean whole tones exceed an octave; the schisma is some 195 cents and has the ratio 32805:32768.) His smallest unit was the amount by which the syntonic comma theoretically exceeds 11 schismas (or by which 11 octaves theoretically exceed the sum of 42 Pythagorean whole tones and 12 pure major 3rds; this is some 1/65-cent, and its ratio would require 49 digits to write out). His intermediate unit (some 0·3 cent) was the amount by which each of the three most common types of just-intonation semitone (16:15, 25:24 and 135:128) theoretically exceeds some combination of the other two units (fig.3) or the amount by which 21 octaves theoretically exceed the difference between 37 5ths and two major 3rds.

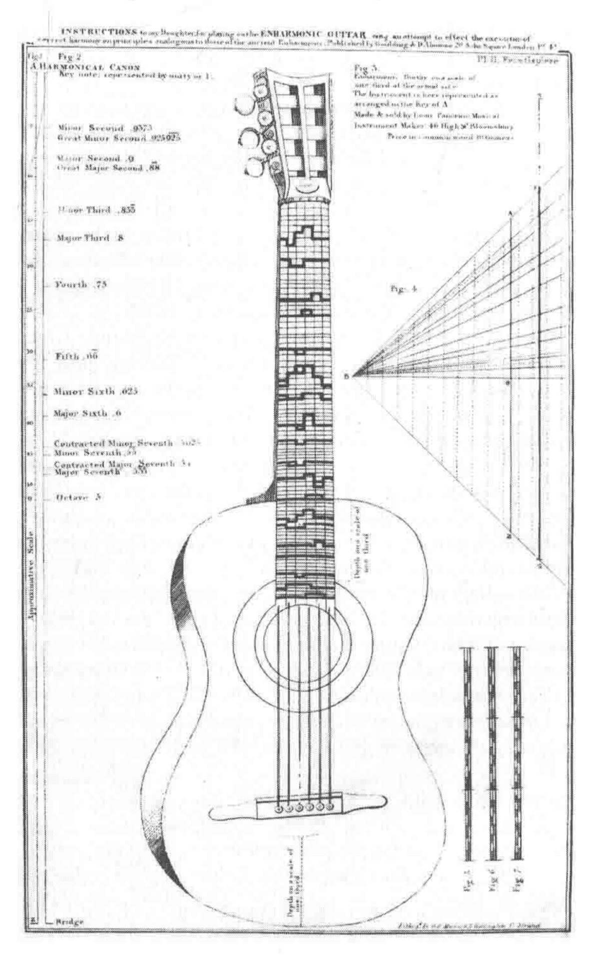
2. Instruments. Rameau reported (1737) that some masters of the violin and basse de viol tempered their open-string intervals – an idea also found in the writings of Werckmeister (1691) and Quantz (Versuch einer Anweisung die Flöte traversiere zu spielen, 1752). But Boyden has shown (1951) that evidence from the writings of 18th-century violinists, particularly Geminiani and Tartini, points to a kind of just intonation flexibly applied to successive intervals with adjustments when necessary both melodically and harmonically on each of the four strings, tuned in pure 5ths, as points of reference. In the 1760s Michele Stratico, a former pupil of Tartini, worked out a fairly efficient system of notation for this kind of just intonation, including septimal intervals (ex.3).



To model a fretted instrument upon just intonation entails the use of zig-zag frets. Dirck Rembrandtsoon van Nierop, a mathematician who favoured just intonation for all sorts of instruments as well as voices, worked out (1659) an exact fretting scheme for a cittern (fig.4*a*), according to which, if the open-string intervals were tuned as in fig.4*b*, then each position on the highest course could be supplied with one or more justly intoned chords as shown in ex.4. Some other devotees of just intonation who designed fretted instruments were Giovanni Battista Doni, Thomas Salmon and Thomas Perronet Thompson (fig.5).

The simplest way to provide all possible pure concords among the naturals of a keyboard instrument with fixed intonation is to have two Ds, one pure with F and A and the other, a comma higher, pure with G and B (fig.6*a*). (The concept of a diatonic scale in just intonation with two Ds a comma apart goes back to Lodovico Fogliano's Musica theorica, 1529.) If this group of eight notes is then provided with a complement of ten chromatic notes as indicated in fig.6*b*, each natural will have available all six of its possible triadic concords. This scheme was described by Mersenne and employed by Joan Albert Ban for a harpsichord built in Haarlem in 1639 (for illustration see BAN, JOAN ALBERT). Mersenne stated that on a keyboard instrument of this type the 'perfection of the harmony' would abundantly repay the difficulty of playing, 'which organists will be able to surmount in the space of one week'.

The 'justly intoned harmonium' of Helmholtz (in mathematical terms not exactly embodying just intonation, but deviating from it insignificantly from a practical and acoustical point of view) combined two normal keyboards for the scheme shown in fig.7. The 12 pitch classes shown to the left are on the upper manual, the 12 to the right on the lower manual. No justly intoned triadic note is present beyond the lines along the top and bottom of the diagram, but the three notes at the right end (A, C♯ or D♭, and E) make justly intoned triads with the three at the left (E, G♯ or A♭, and C). Thus the major and minor triads on F, A, and D♭ or C♯ require the use of both manuals at once. The 12 pitch classes shown in the upper half of the diagram are each a comma lower in intonation than their equivalents in the lower half of the diagram. Every 5th except C♯–G♯ or D♭–A♭ is available at two different pitch levels a comma apart, and the same is true of six triads: the major ones on E, B and F♯, and the minor ones on G♯, D♯ or E♭, and B♭. In the case of triads on C, D, F, G and A, however, the major triad is always intoned a comma higher than its parallel minor triad.

Various other elaborate keyboard instruments capable of playing in just or virtually just intonation have been built by Galeazzo Sabbatini, Doni, H.W. Poole, H. Liston, R.H.M. Bosanquet, S. Tanaka, Eitz, Partch, the Motorola Scalatron Corporation and others (see MICROTONAL INSTRUMENTS). Playing such an instrument involves choosing which form of each note to use at which moment. If the proper choice is consistently made, impure vertical intervals will be avoided and the occurrence of impure melodic ones minimized. The criteria for choosing, which differ in detail with each kind of elaborate keyboard pattern, are intricate but capable of being incorporated in a pattern of electric circuits amounting to a simple computer programme. In 1936 Eivind Groven, a Norwegian composer and musicologist, built a harmonium with 36 pitches per octave tuned to form an extension of Helmholtz's quasi-just-intonation scheme, but with a normal keyboard, the choice of pitch inflections being made automatically while the performer plays as on a conventional instrument. He later (1954) devised a single-stop pipe organ of the same type, now at the Fagerborg Kirke in Oslo, a complete electronic organ with 43 pitches per octave (1965), now at the Valerencen Kirke in Oslo, and a complete pipe organ incorporating his invention (*c*1970, built by Walcker & Cie.). Groven's work has made just intonation practicable on keyboard instruments that are no more difficult to play than ordinary ones.

7. Scheme of Helmholtz's 'justly intoned harmonium'

While the distinctive quality of justly intoned intervals is unmistakable, their aesthetic value is bound to depend upon the stylistic context. In 1955 Kok reported, on the basis of experiments with an electronic organ capable of performing in various tuning systems, that musicians, unlike other listeners, heard the difference between equal and mean-tone temperaments, giving preference to the latter, 'and a fortiori the just intonation, but only in broad terminating chords and for choral-like music. However, they ... do not like the pitch fluctuations caused by instantaneously corrected thirds'. According to McClure ('Studies in Keyboard Temperaments', GSJ, i, 1948, pp.28–40), George Bernard Shaw recalled that in the 1870s the progressions of pure concords on Bosanquet's harmonium (with 53 pitches in each octave) had sounded to him 'unpleasantly slimy'. E.H. Pierce (1924), describing the 1906 model of the Telharmonium, which was capable of being played in just intonation with 36 pitches in each octave, reported:

> The younger players whom I taught ... at first followed out my instructions, but as time went on they began to realize (as in fact I did myself) that there is a spirit in modern music which not only does not demand just intonation, but actually would suffer from its use, consequently they relapsed more and more into the modern tempered scale.

The composer and theorist J.D. Heinichen remarked (Der General-Bass in der Composition, 1728, p.85) that because keys with two or three sharps or flats in their signature were so beautiful and expressive in well-tempered tunings, especially in the theatrical style, he would not favour the invention of the 'long-sought pure-diatonic' keyboard even if it were to become practicable. These remarks suggest that the recently achieved technological feasibility of just intonation on keyboard instruments is but a step towards its musical emancipation and that further steps are likely to depend on the resourcefulness of composers who may be inclined in the future to discover and exploit its virtues.

MARK LINDLEY

Justinus à Desponsatione BMV (d after 1723). Organist and composer, active primarily in Germany. The name of Father Justinus, a member of the Carmelite order, appears in Walther's Musicalisches Lexicon and Jacob Adlung's Anleitung zu der musikalischen Gelahrtheit. These citations refer to three didactic publications by Justinus, intended to teach various aspects of organ and harpsichord playing. Neither Walther nor Adlung identified Justinus's nationality, although if his first printed work appeared in Lentini, Sicily (as surmised by Eitner), perhaps he was of Sicilian or Italian origins. He was, according to Gerber, organist for his order in Würzburg between 1711 and 1723; subsequently he became organist for the Carmelite monastery at Abensberg, between Regensburg and Ingolstadt.

His three extant publications typify early 18th-century instruction manuals in which a brief set of rules is illustrated by music examples. Justinus explains the basic technical requirements of a keyboard player and devotes a few special observations to accompanying the 'chorale', i.e. the plainsong in the Catholic service, continuo realization, and the improvisation of fantasy pieces such as toccatas. The Musicalische Arbeith contains 13 Parthien or suites in four to 11 movements, each set to a different scale in the series C, c, D, d, E♭, e, E, F, g, G, a, A and B♭. The same collection also includes ten Ariae pastorellae, a Musette and a Soldaten-Marche with programmatic subtitles: 'Musquet', 'Dragon', 'Courass', 'Hussar', 'Sipos oder Pfeiffer'. An appendix has a Sonata alla modern in one movement with four sections alternating slow–fast–slow–fast. Although Justinus's music is not without invention, it is generally of less interest in itself than as illustrations of the various keyboard practices which he describes in concise explanations.

Juvarra [Juvara], Filippo (b Messina, 16 June 1676; d Madrid, 31 Jan 1736). Italian architect, stage designer and engraver. From about 1704 he studied architecture in Rome, and in 1706 he was working in the Teatro S Bartolomeo in Naples as assistant to the stage designer Giuseppe Capelli, a pupil of Francesco Galli-Bibiena. After returning to Rome he designed a new theatre for Cardinal Ottoboni in the Palazzo della Cancelleria in 1709 (see illustration) and renovated Prince Capranica's theatre in 1713. In the years following 1709 he built elaborate sets for operas and oratorios in these two theatres and the Queen of Poland's private theatre in the Palazzo Zuccari. He became chief architect to Vittorio Amedeo II of Savoy in 1714 and as such was in charge of the construction of several important buildings in Turin, Piedmont, Portugal and Spain. From the date of his appointment his theatrical activities were confined to directing festivities at the Turin court and to a few isolated building projects.

Juvarra's application of contemporary techniques for illusion in art, especially his perfecting of the 'maniera di veder le scene per angolo' by means of asymmetrical placing of wings, resulted in architectural structures of extraordinary complexity. For all their fantasy, his sets are based on precise architectonic concepts, anticipating the demands of stage theory in the age of Enlightenment. Within the artificial confines of the stage he sought to create an autonomous aesthetic realm which drew its justification primarily from the musico-dramatic work itself, and therefore, like the designs of J.O. Harms, displayed a strong element of lyricism. Juvarra's settings for Alessandro Scarlatti's pastoral Il Ciro (1712) are typical, creating an exotic Arcadia dotted with romantic ruins, foreshadowing the cult of nature and the sensibility of the second half of the century.

MANFRED BOETZKES

Juzeliūnas, Julius (b Čepolė Žeimelis region, 20 Feb 1916). Lithuanian composer. He graduated from Gruodis's class at the Kaunas Conservatory (1948) and completed postgraduate studies at the Leningrad Conservatory in 1952. From that year he taught composition at the Vilnius Conservatory, where he was made professor and doctor of art criticism. His early works such as the first two symphonies and the ballet Ant marių kranto, on the life of Lithuanian fishermen -are neo-romantic, but the mature music shows a combination of national elements with new techniques. In the development of his orchestral and harmonic writing, the Afrikietiški eskizai are particularly important; these form a five-part symphonic cycle, freely using Congolese melodies to create pictures of African nature and life; the harmonies are constructed predominantly from 4ths and 2nds. Baroque forms are taken up in the Concerto for strings and in the Concerto for organ, violin and strings; the latter brings together virtuoso solo parts, clearcut structure and laconic expression. A philosophical deepening in Juzeliūnas's art began with the vocal symphonic poem Pelenų lopšinė, concerning the tragedy of the Lithuanian village of Pirčiupis, a victim of Nazi atrocities. His mature works, notably the Third Symphony, employ an original modal-diatonic harmonic system, set out in detail in K voprosu o stroyenii akkorda ('On the question of chord structure'; Kaunas, 1972). This system divides the 12 pitch classes into groups of three, corresponding to characteristic complexes of Lithuanian folk melody. Transformations and combinations of these trichord cells form the basis of a composition; the principal harmonic intervals are 4ths and 5ths. In 1966 Juzeliūnas was made a People's Artist of the Lithuanian SSR.

Kaa, Franz Ignaz (b Offenburg, bap. 27 Oct 1739; d Cologne, 8 May 1818). German composer. His musical training included studies with J.A. Hasse and two years in Italy. By 1772 he was evidently living in The Hague. He became Kapellmeister at Cologne Cathedral when J.A. Schmittbaur left in 1777. After the French invaded Cologne in 1794 he was soon dismissed from his job, and for the rest of his life he made his living by giving music lessons and selling instrumental accessories. In 1804 he advertised a teaching method based on Marpurg's works. Most of his sacred music combines elements of the stile antico with orchestral passages in the Mannheim style.

Kàan, Jindřich z Albestů (b Tarnopol, Galicia [now Ukraine], 29 May 1852; d Roudná, Tábor district, Bohemia, 7 March 1926). Czech teacher, administrator, pianist and composer of Galician origin. He was brought up in Klatovy, Bohemia, and in Prague, where he studied the piano and composition at the Proksch Institute; he also studied with Blodek, with Ludevít Procházka and at the Prague Organ School (1873–4). After a brief career as a piano virtuoso (1874–6), he was engaged as music teacher to the Fürstenbergs at their seat in Lány in 1876. He returned to Prague in 1884 and later that year accompanied Dvořák on his first visit to England. In 1889 he became a piano teacher at the Prague Conservatory and was, from 1907 until 1918, director. Although unpopular for his authoritarian approach, his good relations with Vienna enabled him to expand the conservatory; for instance, in 1909 he instituted master classes in composition under Vítězslav Novák. Through his piano transcriptions as well as his many editions he helped to popularize Smetana and other Czech composers. His own compositions, apart from piano music, include songs, two operas, two melodramas and two ballets, Bajaja (1897, Prague National Theatre) and Olim (1904, Prague National Theatre).

JOHN TYRRELL

Kabaivanska, Raina (b Burgas, 15 Dec 1934). Bulgarian soprano. She studied at the Bulgarian State Conservatory and made her début in Sofia in 1957 as Tatyana. In 1961, after further study in Italy, she appeared at La Scala in Bellini's Beatrice di Tenda; her American début was at San Francisco in 1962 as Desdemona. She returned regularly to La Scala and has since sung in all the major Italian opera houses; she also appeared at the Metropolitan (début in 1962 as Nedda), Covent Garden (where her Desdemona, opposite Mario Del Monaco in 1964, received great critical acclaim), Moscow, Salzburg and Vienna. In 1973 she sang Hélène in Callas's production of Les vêpres siciliennes at the rebuilt Teatro Regio, Turin. In 1971 she became a permanent guest artist at Hamburg. She made her Paris début in 1975 at the Opéra as Leonora (La forza del destino). Butterfly and Tosca were considered her greatest roles, and her repertory also included the Countess (Capriccio), Elizabeth (Roberto Devereux), Adriana Lecouvreur and Francesca da Rimini. Late in her career she added roles in The Makropulos Affair, The Turn of the Screw and La voix humaine. Her voice was a strong and agreeable lyric soprano, secure in the top register and capable of warm, expressive shading; she was a natural and highly individual actress with a fine stage presence, particularly suited to the verismo repertory, as can be amply confirmed in her video recordings of Tosca, recorded on location in Rome, and of Butterfly caught at the Arena di Verona.

RODOLFO CELLETTI/R

Kabalevsky, Dmitry Borisovich (b St Petersburg, 17/30 Dec 1904; d Moscow, 14 Feb 1987). Russian composer and teacher. He attended the Moscow Conservatory, graduating from Myaskovsky's composition class (1929) and Goldenweiser's piano class (1930). His first works for children appeared during these years (they were written for the pupils of the music college he taught at while a student) as did his first major work, Poėma bor'bï ('Poem of Struggle') in which he attempted to encapsulate the atmosphere and imagery of contemporary life. During the ideologically partisan era of the 1920s, in which the proletarian RAPM group accused the more modernist ASM (which numbered Myaskovsky and Sabaneyev among its leadership) of elitism, Kabalevsky belonged to both groups. His Second Symphony achieved considerable success and was conducted by Coates, Gauk, Golovanov, Sargent and Toscanini; it is notable for its heartfelt lyricism and heightened dramatic effect. The appearance in 1938 of his opera Kola Bryun'yon ('Colas Breugnon') after Romain Rolland, marked a milestone in Kabalevsky's career. He depicted the hero in a heroic Gallic spirit and the music was based on themes stylized in a folk manner; mass scenes – and especially the choral finales – are focal points in the dramatic plan. The opera won approval from Rolland. During the 1930s Kabalevsky, like Prokofiev and Shostakovich, wrote a great deal of music for the emerging genre of films with sound. Many episodes from his film scores were succesful in their own right (the Improvisatsiya for violin originated in Peterburgskaya noch' ('Night in St Petersburg') directed by G. Roshal'), while the popular suite Komedianti ('The Comedians') started life as incidental music for the theatre. It was during the 1930s that Kabalevsky's style was defined; although Prokofiev served as a model to a certain extent, Kabalevsky was far less adventurous in terms of harmony and preferred a more conventional diatonicism interlaced with chromaticism and major-minor interplay. The important role played by the subdominant and the frequent juxtaposition of thirds in Kabalevsky's works are in fact features common to many Russian composers. His use of form is conventional; he preferred symmetrical rondo or variation structures.

Kabalevsky was appointed senior lecturer at the Moscow Conservatory in 1932 and was made professor in 1939. During these years he also worked as a music critic, later (1940–46) he was an editor for the journal Sovetskaya muzïka and for the publishers Muzgiz, and also worked for the All-Union Radio as a critic. During World War II he wrote a series of works connected with that event – such as the cantata Rodina velikaya ('The Great Homeland') and the opera V ogne ('In the Fire') – but these were largely unsuccesful; he had greater success with the 24 Preludes for piano based on Russian folksong which he dedicated to Myaskovsky. These, along with the second and third sonatas (of 1945 and 1946), entered the repertories of a few Russian pianists. The opera Sem'ya Tarasa ('The Taras Family') also dates from these years and concerns the events of the war. Although it was staged in both Leningrad and Moscow (in 1950 and 1951 respectively), it, like all of his later operas, never entered the repertory. The appearance of the Fourth Symphony (1956) was a significant event; its tense and gloomy elegiac style is greatly at odds with the Kabalevsky of preceding years. This lyrical and dramatic vein continued in the Cello Sonata (1962) and the later song cycles and it is perhaps significant that these more personal statements have entered the repertory.

Kabalevsky's most valuable legacy lies in the field of children's music, not only in terms of the many works he wrote for young performers but also in his development of a system of musical education for children. Some of his children's songs became musical symbols of the Soviet age (Chetvyorka druzhnaya rebyat ('The Band of Four Friends') and Shkol'nïye godï ('Schooldays') in particular) while several of his numerous instrumental concertos written for young musicians gained worldwide popularity. Although he wrote a great deal for children's choruses, he frequently wrote for children within the context of a large-scale work intended for professional performance; the forces required for his Rekviyem ('Requiem') of 1962 which was dedicated to the victims of World War II included a children's chorus. The last 20 years of Kabalevsky's life saw a growing estrangement between him and his composer colleagues due to his unyielding rejection of new music. He concentrated instead on developing a programme for music in schools, made appearances at concerts and lectures and, like Kodály and Orff before him, actually taught at a school. These experiences resulted in his two books about music for children which appeared in the 1970s and 80s.

Kabalevsky's traditional stance as a composer and his strong sense of civil duty which found expression in his education work endeared him to the Soviet regime; the long list of honours and awards he received – and these include the Lenin Prize (1972) and Hero of Socialist Labour (1974) – is a testament to his ability to work as a creative artist in conditions under which many others had great difficulties.
